"There is nothing new about Mr. Laing's opinions, nor is any novelty claimed for them. The new thing is that a Scotch politician and man of business turned seventy should employ his leisure moments in compiling and publishing a popular hand-book of Agnosticism. . . . Mr. Laing is always candid, and generally accurate."—Acad., xxviii. 145.

"Mr. Laing condenses a goodly number of the facts and processes of the material and moral universe, until he obtains as their outcome and expression a single general law of duality or mutually antagonistic principles. He terms this 'the all-pervading principle of polarity which manifests itself everywhere as the fundamental condition of the material and spiritual universe.' . . . I cannot say that Mr. Laing advances a single argument . . . more cogent than the undoubted fact that the two ends of a walking-stick, in whatever position it be held, point in diametrically opposite directions."—JOHN OWEN: Acad., xxxii. 215.

"These volumes will not be unwelcome to readers fond of literary gossip. They abound in anecdotes concerning Haydon, Wilkie, and Lawrence, Wordsworth, Hazlitt, and Scott. William Bewick—not to be confounded with the celebrated engraver of that name—was born towards the close of the last century; he became the pupil of Haydon, and was subsequently employed by Sir Thomas Lawrence to make copies of the frescoes of Michael Angelo in the Sistine Chapel. . . . He appears in these pages in the character of Boswell. . . . But the materials are trite, and the style is far from commendable. . . . The facts and interspersed anecdotes have value, but the criticisms and reflections are all but worthless."—Sat. Rev., xxxii. 253.

He is a writer for the London Daily News, a frequent contributor to periodical literature, and editor of the "English Worthies" series. 1. Ballads and Lyrics of Old France: with other Poems, Lon., 1872, p. 8vo.

"A series of translations from the older French poets comes first, and later in the volume there are some further specimens of poets in the nineteenth century. The rest of the space is filled with original lyrics, all written in the manner of a student of Ronsard or of the classical sources of Ronsard's lyrics, approached in his spirit and used after his method. . . . There are in the book, however, two series of short poems, the first called 'Ave,' and the other 'Hesperothen,' parts of which strike us as possessing singular delicacy and beauty."—Sat. Rev., xxxiv. 286.

2. Oxford: Brief Historical and Descriptive Notes: with Etchings and Vignettes by A. Brunet-Debaines, A. Toussaint, and R. Kent Thomas, Lon., 1880, fol.

"It is hard for one who wields even the most skilful pencil to satisfy those who know Oxford well. Yet M. Brunet-Debaines and his collaborateurs in the work of illustration leave little to be desired. . . . Mr Lang's task has been more difficult. . . . He follows in his papers, which are only too brief and few, the historical method; and he writes, it is evident, out of no inconsiderable fulness of knowledge."—Spectator, liii. 20.

3. XXII. Ballades in Blue China, Lon., 1880, 8vo and 12mo; 2d ed., with ten additional ballades, 1881; new ed., 1888.

"In the quaint and dainty little book he has just published, Mr. Lang for a while amuses himself by clothing modern themes in the somewhat arbitrary forms of the elder French poets. . . . He takes us to no regions which lovers of poetry would explore for special beauty. We breathe no mountain airs, and catch no glimpses of sea or the far horizons. In the mean time a garden-plot, with a peacock on the lawn, set beds, and quaintly-cut hedges, forms no bad resting-place for the tourist."—Ath., No. 2745.

6. Helen of Troy. Lon., 1882, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1883.

"In this story in rhyme of the fortunes of Helen, the theory that she was an unwilling victim of the gods has been preferred. Many of the descriptions of manners are versified from the 'Iliad' and the 'Odyssey.' The description of the events after the death of Hector, and the account of the sack of Troy, is chiefly borrowed from 'Quintus Smyrnæus.'"—Author's Preface.

"It is less a poem than the materials for a poem; less an epic than a string of episodes. It is, in short, not so much the tale of Helen of Troy as a rhymed summary of all that Mr. Lang's reading has taught him of her; but a summary touched often with the charm of feeling, moving sometimes with the directness and rapidity essential to story-telling, and rhymed always with admirable grace and dexterity."—*Sat. "The essential purpose of Mr. Lang's book is to plead for, or, if that term be thought too deferential, to uphold, a new method in the study of mythology as against the method which is at present in favour with the philologists. . . . He would have mythology treated more from the ethnological point of view."—Sat. Rev., lviii. 764.

"Mr. Lang is an anthropologist of the most uncompromising kind, and though he does not go so far as the dusky philosopher of Lenuka, who considered cannibalism to be the ideal form of political economy, inasmuch as it prevents waste, employs the baker, and saves the expense of the grave-digger, he shows with considerable exhilaration that our ancestors were savages, and that stories which formerly were assumed to belong to the Aryan family are the staple of general savage myth. . . . Still, if it is possible for Max Müller to go too far with his undoubted Aryan, so it is possible for Mr. Lang to make too much of his undoubted cannibal. Like his dethroned predecessor, the cannibal has the dangerous vice of 'proving too much.' . . . Pursued, however, with proper discretion, Mr. Lang's interpretation of myths seems likely to do much valuable work."—Ath., Nos. 2991, 2992.

"Mr. Lang's new book could have been written by nobody but Mr. Lang. It is his in its merits and defects alike, —in the elegance and variety of its literary accomplishment, its quaint and irrelevant humour, its excellent scholarship, its honesty of tone and utterance and intention, as it is his in its tendency to be 'off the spot' and to make mistakes, its occasional impertinence, its touches of 'preciousness' in style and of priggishness in sentiment." —Ath., No. 3048.

"Mr. Lang does not deal with 'myth, ritual, and religion' under all their aspects, nor does he offer his work as a key to all the mythologies. His special purpose is to examine the irrational, and to us savage and obscene, element in myth and ritual, and, by connecting it with a definite mental and social stage in the life-history of mankind, to account for it."—Ath., No. 3127.

Lanier, Clifford Anderson, b. 1844, at Griffin, Ga.; brother of Sidney Lanier, infra; served in the Confederate army, and was superintendent of the city schools of Montgomery, Ala., 1885–86. Thorn-Fruit: a Novel, N. York, 1867, 8vo.

Lanier, Sidney, 1842–1881, b. at Macon, Ga.; educated at Oglethorpe College, Midway, Ga.; served as a private in the Confederate army during the civil war, and in 1863, while in charge of a blockade-runner, was captured and spent several months in prison. He was subsequently a clerk, a teacher, and a lawyer, but during the last ten years of his life devoted himself to literature, while struggling against the inroads of consumption. His poem entitled Corn, which was published in Lippincott's Magazine in 1875, attracted much attention, and he was engaged in the following year to write the words for a cantata by Mr. Dudley Buck performed at the opening of the Centennial Exhibition. In 1877 he settled in Baltimore, and in 1879 was appointed lecturer on English literature at Johns Hopkins University. 1. Tiger-Lilies: a Novel, N. York, 1867, 16mo. "The characteristic feature of Mr. Lanier's treatise is the application of the principles and notation of music to English verse. . . . In a learned and interesting preface Mr. Lanier gives an historical sketch of the attempts to construct a theory of the technic of English verse. He thinks this sketch justifies a new attempt. . . . The whole work shows extensive reading and a refined taste both in poetry and in music."—Nation, xxxi. 310.

"This volume is an apotheosis of George Eliot. . . . The whole treatment of the sociology of the subject is so vague, slight, and discursive, and is, besides, so involved in doubtful literary criticism, that discussion of it is futile." —Nation, xxxvii. 38.

10. Poems, [edited by his Wife: with a Preface by Dr. William Hayes Ward,] N. York, 1884, 8vo.

"It is a book of absorbing interest, and will, if we mistake not, raise the dead poet to a much higher position than has yet been conceded to him. . . . The man is profoundly in earnest; his character is simple, and, if his strains are not so, it is because of youth and ill health and an almost morbid conscientiousness in the direction of certain theories of sound and phrase. . . . It grows clearer and clearer how much we lost in Sidney Lanier."—Nation, xxxix. 527.

"Lanier died so early that he did not really show us more than the bud of his genius; but if he had lived ten years longer he would, we believe, have ranked high among English poets, and probably above every American poet of the past."—Spectator, December 6, 1890.

He has travelled round the world, and visited many countries as an amateur missionary, distributing tracts, Bibles, &c. 1. Through Siberia. Illust. and Maps. Lon., 1882, 2 vols. 8vo; 4th ed., 1883.

"His book is much too long, and in some parts it is wearisome. In spite of this great drawback, it will nevertheless find readers enough; for it contains a great deal of very interesting and curious matter, while the style is, on the whole, clear and lively. Moreover, to a large extent, the author breaks fresh ground."—Sat. Rev., liii. 243.

"It is a genuine record of a remarkable expedition, written by a traveller who has evidently eyes with which to see clearly, and a mind free from prejudice or bias, whether political or theological. Making his way right across Siberia from the Ural Mountains to the Sea of Japan, he visited the prisons in each town at which he arrived, and every mine or other place of penal servitude which lay near his track."—Ath., No. 2830.

"He is terribly long-winded. He loads his pages with trivial details and petty anecdotes. . . . His descriptions of scenery are often striking and effective."—Sat. Rev., lx. 160.

"A most important and valuable contribution to our knowledge of the subject. . . . Dr. Lansdell has done good service by visiting the Russian prisons and describing, we are sure, with fidelity, what he saw. But it is to be feared that he has gone too far in giving a definite and complete denial to the charges of cruelty and oppression brought against the agents of the Russian government by Prince Krapotkine, M. Lavrof, and 'Stepniak.'"—Ath., No. 3011.

Larkin, Henry, at one time "collector or cashier of the Chelsea steamers," afterwards a partner in some prosperous metallurgic or engineering business; assisted Carlyle in the preparation of indexes, &c., 1855–58, and is thus spoken of by him:

"He did for me all manner of maps, indexes, summaries, copyings, sortings, miscellanea of every kind, in a way not to be surpassed for completeness, ingenuity, patience, exactitude, and total and continual absence of fuss."—Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle, Amer. ed., ii. 114.

Carlyle, and the Open Secret of his Life, Lon., 1886, 8vo.

"Though what Mr. Larkin says is well worth considering, he has not succeeded very well in making out his case for what he terms the 'open secret' of Carlyle's life. This 'open secret,' briefly stated, is that, so far from Carlyle being a man of letters by preference, the darling desire of his soul was to be a man of affairs,—a social regenerator of this age of shams in somewhat the same fashion as Cromwell was the social regenerator of another age of shams. . . . On this subject Mr. Larkin is an advocate rather than a critic. He holds a brief for this fantastic theory; but his case is inherently so weak that all his strenuous efforts, combined with undoubted ingenuity, entirely fail to maintain it. . . . When Mr. Larkin leaves the realm of fancy and settles himself to sober criticism, his discourse becomes decidedly more instructive."—WALTER LEWIN: Acad., xxix. 407.

"Essentially a sporting novel, with a spiritual ending suggested by the taste of the age. . . . But in its way the book is thoroughly clever, lively, and altogether readable, and even, as a study of a certain kind of life and character, instructive. The writer is not a mere fox-hunter or worshipper of fox-hunters, but a cultivated man, . . . with a style decidedly more artistic than that of novelists in general, and full—too full—of point and literary and historical allusion."—*Sat. "His style is clear, nervous, and highly graphic, though somewhat spoilt by that affectation of swagger which looks as if he thought the pen of the writer must be held in the fist of the athlete. On his own ground, amid the struggles of the turf and the talk of the stable, he has no superior among the writers of the day. . . . And into his flashes of sporting wit, or his episodes of fast life generally, he can throw an unparalleled amount of reality and point. It is in his defective grasp of moral action, and in his preposterous elevation of the physical and material over all other elements of character, that he debars himself from higher rank in literature than that of a bold and clever writer with only a single idea, and that anything but a profound and wholesome one."—*Sat. Lazarus, Miss Emma, 1849–1887, b. in New York City, of Jewish parents, and educated by private tutors. She showed very early a poetic gift; her first verses were inspired by the outbreak of the civil war, when she was eleven years old, and her earliest published volume was composed of poems and translations written between the ages of fourteen and seventeen. For some years her poems were published for the most part in Lippincott's Magazine. Her later lyrics and some critical and political articles were contributed to the Century. In 1882, when a great immigration of Russian Jews to New York took place, she published articles in the American Hebrew suggesting a system of technical education as a means towards their employment, a plan which was put into execution. From that time she devoted her pen to Hebrew subjects, publishing an article in the Century on Russian Christianity versus Modern Judaism, which attracted much attention. 1. Poems and Translations, N. York, 1866, cr. 8vo. 2. Admetus, and other Poems, N. York, 1871, cr. 8vo.

"Among the pieces which we think are to be praised for positive merits of their own are those composing a series which the author names 'Epochs.' These are in a way sentimental poems; but there is in them a naturalness of sentiment, a force and apparent honesty united with a certain artistic reserve of expression, a firm hold on the realities of feeling amid temptations to morbidness of feeling, which altogether seem to us worthy of high praise."—Nation, xiv. 92.

"Her chief poems are all good. She is able to produce vivid effect without display of force. Her subtlety is marked, and she leaves no traces of her art. There is, however, something—and not much—wanting to complete her success and place her alongside of the masters. Each of the poems we have named has conspicuous merits. In each, however, the author has interpreted the legend in the thought of our day. She fails to give us a translation of the thought of the time which produced it, but offers us the version which would now be framed. 'Admetus,' which gives title to the volume, is, we think, the best of the poems. Its abrupt opening, its progress, and its termination are admirable. In 'Orpheus,' too, there are some splendidly descriptive passages."—Ath., No. 2291.

4. Translations, and other Rhymes, Phila., 1882, 12mo. Privately printed. 5. A History of the Inquisition of the Middle Ages, N. York, 1887–88, 3 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Lea takes his subject in its widest meaning. By the history of the Inquisition he means not merely an account of the institution itself, but an exhaustive examination of the social, intellectual, and political conditions which produced it. He means, further, an array of illustrations of its working and of its effects upon society, such as make any serious doubts as to the general accuracy of his presentation impossible. . . . It may be safely said that no presentation of the story of the Inquisition by previous writers can be at all compared with this for its clearness of vision, its comprehension of the problem, and its thoroughness of research."—Nation, xlvi. 450.

"He has chosen a subject of extreme interest and importance, and has treated it in a manner that leaves nothing to be desired with respect to erudition, while he has at the same time produced a thoroughly readable book, well arranged, full of incident, and vigorously written."—Sat. Rev., lxvi. 22.

"The book begins with a survey of all that led to the growth of heresy, and to the creation, in the thirteenth century, of exceptional tribunals for its suppression. There can be no doubt that this is the least satisfactory portion of the whole. It is followed by a singularly careful account of the steps, legislative and administrative, by which church and state combined to organize the intermediate institution, and of the manner in which its methods were formed by practice. Nothing in European literature can compete with this, the centre and substance of Mr. Lea's great history. In the remaining volumes he summons his witnesses, calls on the nations to declare their experience, and tells how the new force acted upon society to the end of the middle ages. History of this undefined and international cast, which shows the same wave breaking upon many shores, is always difficult, from the want of visible unity and progression, and has seldom succeeded so well as in this rich but unequal and disjointed narrative. . . . As a philosophy of religious persecution the book is inadequate. The derivation of sects, though resting always upon good supports, stands out from an indistinct background of dogmatic history. The intruding maxims, darkened by shadows of earth, fail to insure at all times the objective and delicate handling of mediæval theory. But the vital parts are protected by a panoply of mail. From the Albigensian crusade to the fall of the Templars and to that Franciscan movement wherein the key to Dante lies, the design and organization, the activity and decline of the Inquisition constitute a sound and solid structure that will survive the censure of all critics."—Lord Acton: English Historical Review, No. 12.

Lecky, William Edward Hartpole, M.A., b. 1838, in the neighborhood of Dublin; graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, 1859. His works have all been translated into German, and some of them into other languages. In 1886 he announced himself as an opponent of Home Rule, to which he had been previously supposed to be favorable. 1. The Leaders of Public Opinion in Ireland, Lon., 1861, 8vo. Anon. New ed., 1872, p. 8vo. 2. History of the Rise and Influence of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe, Lon., 1865, 2 vols. 8vo; 5th ed., 1872.

"He is the historian of the rise and progress of that resistance to the Christianity of clerical interpretation which has gone by the names of private judgment, rationalism, latitudinarianism, blasphemy, infidelity, or atheism, according to the speaker and his bias. . . . It is a heap of historical facts, with incidental remarks, all tending to one end,—namely, the exhibition of the slow progress from slavery to freedom."—Ath., No. 1960.

3. History of European Morals from Augustus to Charlemagne, Lon., 1869, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1877.

"Mr. Lecky's forte is his power of bringing a great number of scattered social phenomena to a focus, putting a distinct meaning on what he has brought together, and connecting these generalized appearances one with another; but in the stage beyond this, where we pass from stating broad facts to philosophizing, . . . he does not seem to us so strong. . . . But after all allowances made for imperfect execution, and for the great diversities of judgment which must inevitably arise on Mr. Lecky's subject, his book occupies a field which no one in England has yet attempted to master; and if he fails to satisfy us, he gives us plenty to think about."—Sat. Rev., xxvii. 588.

4. A History of England in the Eighteenth Century: vols. i., ii., Lon., 1878, 8vo; 3d ed., rev., 1883.

"We find in this 'History of the Eighteenth Century' the old unwearied industry, especially in the by-paths of literature, his delicate sublety of observation, and the same fine ear for the undertones of life, which are apt to be drowned in the noisy hum of battles, sieges, and dynastic changes. The eighteenth century has been examined by many historians, but few of them have cast their plummets so deep as to take note, as he has done, of those undercurrents, often running counter to that flowing on the surface, the latter perhaps bearing straws to the north, the former hurrying on the life and wealth of the ocean to the south. Mr. Lecky's book must be read by every one who aspires to understand that alternately maligned and glorified age. . . . And yet it does not show Mr. Lecky at his best. . . . It is in some respects not a history at all. It is a chain of dissertations on the morals and manners of the last age."—Spectator, li. 247.

Vols. iii., iv., 1882.

"In none of the three principal divisions of the narrative contained in these volumes [the king's struggle for personal government, the revolt of the American colonies, and Irish history] is Mr. Lecky untrue to what we have formerly recognized as his most admirable qualities as an historical writer. Whatever showiness—if we may use the term—there may heretofore have been about his manner, he has now learnt to eschew; he neither seeks to dazzle by multitudinous facts nor to snatch assent by swift generalizations. . . . His fairness of mind never seems to abandon him even towards a victrix causa which may fail to possess his good will."—Sat. Rev., liv. 85.

Vols. v., vi., 1887; vols. vii., viii., completing the work, 1890. (The last two vols. deal exclusively with the history of Ireland from 1793 to the passing of the act of Union.)

"His view of history and of the progress of civilization is essentially Whiggish. . . . That Mr. Lecky has accomplished his difficult task with impartiality and in a manner worthy of his reputation will, I think, be admitted by every one who has any independent acquaintance with the original sources of his information. To admit this is not necessarily to imply absolute agreement with all his conclusions, but it is to acknowledge that he has never wilfully suppressed any fact material to the arguments of those who differ from him."—R. DUNLOP: Acad., xxxviii. 441.

"Mr. Lecky's history—and we use the phrase in no invidious sense, but rather honoris causa—is a work of 'golden mediocrity.'"—Spectator, lv. 627.

Lee, William, superintending inspector of the General Board of Health. Daniel Defoe: his Life and Recently-Discovered Writings, extending from 1716 to 1729, Lon., 1869, 3 vols. 8vo. (Two of the volumes consist of essays, letters, and miscellaneous articles not previously known to have been written by Defoe, while the memoir embraces many new facts, corrects numerous errors in former biographies, and throws much new light on Defoe's character and career.)

"A recent discovery has been the means not only of adding a new chapter to the history of Defoe, but of bringing about little less than a revolution in the estimate in which his character has been popularly held. The thanks of the public are due to Mr. Lee for the pains with which he has followed the clue thus unexpectedly afforded. His own partiality or admiration makes him, indeed, scarcely sensible of the havoc which his revelation must inevitably play with the reputation of his idol. . . . Nevertheless, whatever critical value we may attach to his judgment in this respect, there can be no two opinions as to the importance of the materials which his industry and zeal have placed at our disposal."—*Sat. "The book is a good book and extremely readable, notwithstanding the drawbacks to which we have called attention. We are sure that the authors must be capital fellows, and the pleasantest companions in their private relations. They are keen sportsmen: they know Norway well. . . . Nothing in the book is more entertaining . . . than the details of their camp life and devices."—Sat. Rev., liii. 542.

"So cleverly and cunningly written that it is almost impossible to discover exactly who the two out of the three are who have written it. It is one of the smartest specimens of what may be called literary thimble-rigging that we have ever met. Now the writers seem to speak from under the Skipper's thimble, now from Esau's, sometimes even from John's, but whoever or how many wrote it, the result is charming in its freshness and good humour."—*Edin. A Hand-Book for Field Service, Lon., 1854, sq. 32mo. 2. Memorials of the Discovery and Early Settlement of the Bermudas or Somers Islands. Vol. i., 1515–1652. Lon., 1877, r. 8vo.

"The volume is so bulky, the details are so copious, the spelling so antiquated, and several of the topics so purely departmental, that the work must ever remain one to be consulted by the historian or prized by the settler, rather than sought after by the general public. We can, however, promise to all who are fond of rummaging into family, county, or provincial histories, an entertaining account of the manners and customs of our forefathers in the days of Elizabeth, the first two Stuarts, and the Commonwealth."—*Sat. "Mr. Leland evidently considers himself entitled to indulge in the vagaries of a professed humourist. . . . A large, probably the largest, part of the book is deliberately intended to be simply amusing; and we are not a little startled when in the last page he informs us that his real desire was 'to grapple with the tremendous social and industrial problems which this wonderful country presents.' . . . We may say unhesitatingly that, however funny he may be, he thinks himself funnier than he is. He makes a great many jokes which are simply failures, and others which we are afraid are simply vulgar. . . . Mixed with such twaddle there is a great deal of writing which shows that he is a man of reading, of intelligence, and even of cultivated taste."—Sat. Rev., xxxvi. 445.

"In making this collection Mr. Leland has entered upon a comparatively unexplored field of literary research, and as he has evidently given much patient labor to the preparation of the volume, his opinions are entitled to careful consideration, even though they do not always carry conviction."—Nation, xxxix. 551.

"Mr. Leland thinks that a good deal of Eddaic lore has filtered through the Eskimo to the Algonquins. . . . We confess that after reading all Mr. Leland's tales—very good tales, very well told—we are slightly inclined not to believe in Scandinavian influence on the Algonquin legends."—Ath., No. 2988.

Leonowens, Mrs. Anna Harriette, b. 1834, in Caernarvon, Wales; daughter of Thomas M. Crawford, a British officer, who was killed by the Sikhs at Lahore; married to Thomas Leonowens, of the British army. In 1863, being a widow, she was appointed governess to the family of the King of Siam, and also acted as secretary to the king in his foreign correspondence. In 1867 she removed to the United States and settled in New York City, where she established a school for the training of kindergarten-teachers. 1. The English Governess at the Siamese Court: being Recollections of Six Years in the Royal Palace at Bangkok: with Illustrations from Photographs presented to the Author by the King of Siam, Bost. and Lon., 1870, 8vo.

"Whenever the author is occupied with the story of her intercourse with the royal family, she is very lively and everyway admirable. . . . When the author comes outside of the palace gates, and away from the immediate care of her pupils, she grows uninteresting. . . . It is one of the most entertaining of recent books of travel."—Nation, xii. 161.

"She is obviously a keen and sensible observer, and made good use of the opportunities which her unique position opened to her. . . . Altogether her book is one of which the blemishes will be readily forgiven for the sake of the novel, strange, and instructive matter which she has in so much abundance and with so much vividness set before the public."—*Sat. "Her style has manifestly improved since the publication of her former work. . . . A volume of much interest to the general reader, and some pictures of Oriental manners and character, marred, indeed, by high colouring and by the omission of many prominent features, but still unfamiliar to the inhabitants of the West, and more illustrative of Eastern habits and phases of thought than anything which we have fallen in with elsewhere."—Ath., No. 2364.

(The selection was made originally by Mr. Harness, who did not live to complete the work.)

"Miss Mitford's letters show a mind and nature to which no literary success could do full justice. They show a life full of energy, sympathy, kindness, observation; a mind of extraordinary versatility, in harmony with its times, and keeping its powers and its interests in books and men vigorous to the last. They illustrate for fifty years the art and literature of the day. . . . We recognize in her the qualities of a good and popular letter-writer,—a ready pen, vivacity if not wit, a memory for a good story, a love of the better kind of gossip, a wish to amuse, the power of keeping her own troubles in the background, a gift of grasping criticism,—hitting off an impression in a few apt phrases,—and the inspiriting quality of taking a bright view of new things, whether a new book or a new picture or a new friend. . . . One chief interest of her letters is the portraits, characters, and traits of distinguished people who came in her way. . . . We seldom meet with a well-known name in these pages but we get something characteristic, and showing knowledge and appreciation."—Sat. Rev., xxviii. 737.

Leyland, Francis A. The Brontë Family: with Special Reference to Patrick Branwell Brontë, Lon., 1885, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The real raison d'être of Mr. Leyland's book . . . is the desire to reverse the verdict of posterity as regards Branwell Brontë. . . . Mr. Leyland . . . had a brother, a local sculptor, who knew Branwell rather intimately, and who preserved a great many of his letters, verses, and sketches. . . . His letters are extraordinarily vulgar and poor; his poems are without a sparkle of merit."—Sat. Rev., lxi. 25.

"In so far . . . as Mr. Leyland has attempted to raise Branwell Brontë to a vacant pinnacle and confer upon him an honour which assuredly is not his due, his book is a failure; but it is so full of interesting information that as a contribution to literary biography it may be considered a real success."—J. "This is a fine series of lectures, in which our readers will find some of the most candid, temperate, and thoughtful answers which have ever been given to the religious doubts of our day, and will find these answers arranged with all that lucid beauty of statement and profound depth of feeling which have long constituted the fascination of Dr. Liddon's sermons."—Spectator, xlv. 1205.

"Thoughtful as Dr. Liddon's sermons are in substance, refined and weighty in style, clear in exposition and arrangement, splendidly eloquent in certain passages, there is undoubtedly a tendency to fall into one or two limited trains of thought, which makes all his sermons slightly monotonous in tone."—Spectator, lix. 687.

"There are few sermons in the rich and varied literature of the pulpit which would compare with these sermons of Canon Liddon's for eloquence of expression, for depth of conviction, for delicacy of discrimination in distinguishing the most vivid elements of human experience, for power in describing the characteristic facts of human nature, and for that refinement of feeling which enables the preacher to use all his eloquence, all his earnestness, all his insight into imaginative beauty, and all his knowledge of human character, without for a moment jarring those chords of our nature on which the religious orator too often strikes so as to make us shrink from him."—Spectator, lxi. 512.

"Unelastic in his intellectual framework, he was eminently elastic in every other field of life,—in sympathy, in imagination, in affection, in sensibility, in logical acuteness, in mental alertness, in mode of expression, in turns of feeling. . . . Thus he had the double gift of the preacher. He impressed, he overawed, he mastered, by the sense of unshaken solidity which his mental characteristics assured to him. . . . And yet at the service of this unmoving creed was a brain, a heart, alive with infinite motion, abounding in rich variety, fertile, resourceful, quickening, expanding, vital."—CANON SCOTT HOLLAND: Contemporary Review, Oct. 1890.

Lindsay, Alexander William Crawford, Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1812–1880, succeeded to the title in 1869. He devoted himself mainly to historical and antiquarian studies, and to the formation of a library unrivalled among private collections for the number and value of its rare books, first editions, and manuscripts in various languages. 1. Scepticism a Retrogressive Movement in Theology and Philosophy, as contrasted with the Church of England, Catholic (at once) and Protestant, Stable and Progressive, Lon., 1861, 8vo.

"It contains the fruit of very extensive research. . . . But the style is not attractive. . . . Lord Lindsay thinks nothing of a sentence an octavo page long."—Sat. Rev., xii. 226.

2. On the Theory of the English Hexameters, Lon., 1862, sq. 8vo.

"We charge Lord Lindsay with the crime of driving simple folk from the customary worship of Homer by the contempt into which he brings him by his crotchet about translation into English Hexameters, (falsely so called,) and by the intolerably bad English Hexameters in which he has travestied him."—*Sat. This book is as far as possible from a parody, nor is it even an attack, except incidentally, on the theology of orthodoxy; it is a very fair and, with one exception, a skilful attempt to delineate the story of a spiritual-minded young man of the working-class of our own day, beginning his career with the human life of Christ as his absolute ideal, and in a much too narrow sense his model, and gradually modifying his conception of it . . . in the course of an unassisted struggle with the principles and machinery of modern society."—Spectator, xlvi. 375.

"We may accept this admirable treatise as a sort of foretaste of the larger and more comprehensive work on wood-engraving which is expected from the author. . . . It is what it purposes [purports?] to be,—a manual of instruction; not a few hints more or less carefully arranged, but a thorough and business-like treatise on essential points. . . . As might be expected from Mr. Linton, the book is likewise somewhat controversial. He is not content with explaining the intelligence and art with which Bewick and Thomson chose their lines, but he must point out how absent these qualities are in much modern work which passes for fine wood-engraving."—Acad., xxvi. 32.

"Mr. Little, although a missionary, like Mr. Shaw, [see SHAW, GEORGE A., infra,] is a livelier writer, and has a quicker eye at once for the beautiful in Nature and for the grotesque in man. . . . When the two authors deal with the same subject, as in their remarks on the flora and fauna of Madagascar, then the value of Mr. Shaw's thorough-going workmanlike method tells, very much as a long sweep in rowing does against a short though pretty stroke. Happily, however, Mr. Shaw dwells very largely, as the title of his volume indicates, on the history of the relations between France and Madagascar, to which his brother-missionary makes but a slight and passing reference. Mr. Little has therefore the fields of physical and social description very much to himself."—Spectator, lviii. 390.

Livingstone, Rev. David, D.D., [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1817–1873, b. at Blantyre, Lanarkshire, Scotland; began at ten years of age to work in a cotton-mill; was educated at Glasgow University, continuing his work in the mill during the vacations; studied medicine and theology; received the license of the Glasgow Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons in 1838; was ordained in 1840, and sent to Africa as an agent of the London Missionary Society. He married the daughter of the Rev. Robert Moffatt in 1844, and she accompanied him on his journeys till her death in 1862. With the exception of visits to England in 1856–58 and in 1864–65, Livingstone remained in Africa, making the explorations which have rendered his name pre-eminent among discoverers in the present century. He had severed his connection with the London Missionary Society, but never ceased to consider himself a missionary. A report of his death reached England in 1867, but was disproved by letters afterwards received from him. In February, 1871, the proprietor of the New York Herald sent Henry M. Stanley, infra, in search of Livingstone, who was found at Ujiji in November; but, though very ill, he refused to return to England, having determined to discover the true sources of the Nile. He struggled on until May 1, 1873, when he died at Ulalu. His body was carried to England and buried in Westminster Abbey. For biog., see BLAIKIE, W., supra, MARRAT, J., and MOSSMAN, S., infra. 1. Expedition to the Zambesi and its Tributaries, Lon., 1865, 8vo. 2. The Last Journals of David Livingstone in Central Africa, from 1865 until his Death: continued by a Narrative of his Last Moments and Sufferings obtained from his Faithful Servants, Chuma and Susi. By Horace Waller, F.R.G.S., Rector of Tugwell, Northampton. With Portrait, Map, and Illustrations. Lon., 1874, 2 vols. 8vo.

"These Journals are the best work that we have ever had from Livingstone's pen, but it is impossible to condemn too severely the careless, vulgar, and ignorant way in which Mr. Waller has edited them. . . . It is in the exposition of the scientific results of Livingstone's expedition that Mr. Waller most conspicuously fails. . . . He has virtually left Livingstone's notes just as he found them,—a jungle without sign-post or tracks, more bewildering to the general reader than the wilds and desolate wastes through which Livingstone himself passed. . . . The narrative of Livingstone's last sufferings and death, and of the transport of his body to Zanzibar, . . . has been admirably elaborated by Mr. Waller."—G. BIRDWOOD: Acad., vii. 159.

"Mr. Waller . . . deserves great praise for the excellence of his editing. . . . No editing, however, can possibly do for us what Livingstone could have done himself. At best we must be content with receiving the raw materials of a book of travels instead of the complete book."—Sat. Rev., xxxviii. 801.

Whatever judgment may be formed as to the validity of his hypothesis, the indefatigable ardour with which he has attacked the great problem of the constitution of the sun, and the skill with which he has devised fresh methods of testing and re-testing the meaning of the phenomena observed and the soundness of the arguments based thereon, merit the warmest acknowledgment."—A. Lodge, Henry Cabot, Ph.D., b. 1850, in Boston, Mass.; graduated at Harvard 1871, and at the Law

School 1874; was university lecturer on American history 1876–79; editor of the North American Review 1873–76, and of the International Review 1879–81. He served in the Massachusetts legislature 1880–81, and in 1886 was elected to Congress. He has edited an edition of the works of Alexander Hamilton. 1. Life and Letters of George Cabot, Bost., 1877, 8vo.

"It is a direct continuation of Mr. George Gibbs's 'Memoir of Oliver Wolcott,' which is better known as the 'History of the Administrations of Washington and Adams.' Both are histories of New England Federalism, but Mr. Gibbs stopped short at the year 1801, while Mr. John C. Hamilton's 'Memoir of Alexander Hamilton,' which is also better known under the more ambitious title of 'History of the Republic,' stops with the death of its principal character in 1804. The 'Life of George Cabot' carries the story down to the extinction of Federalism in the peace of Ghent. There remains to be written only the life of Rufus King to place Federalism in one complete picture before the eyes of historians. . . . Mr. Lodge aims, like the others, at presenting his side of the picture, and, naturally, the view of his ancestor, in the most favorable light; but he writes with good temper, and, as a rule, is disposed to let his characters speak for themselves. . . . Many of his most interesting and important documents, and the greater part of his proofs, are drawn from the Pickering MS. in the library of the Massachusetts Historical Society."—Nation, xxv. 11.

2. (Ed.) Ballads and Lyrics, Bost., 1880, 16mo. 3. A Short History of the English Colonies in America, N. York, 1881, 8vo.

Such a work is especially valuable to the student of American constitutional history in the wide sense of that term."—Nation, xxxii. 373.

5. Daniel Webster, ("American Statesmen,") Bost., 1883, 16mo.

"The purpose of the book is, on the one hand, simply to present an outline of Webster's career, and, on the other, to show the significance of that career in the constitutional development of the country. In so far as it may be possible to separate from each other the two parts of this double purpose, it may be said that the first has been performed with eminent success. . . . In what is to be called the second part of his general purpose, Mr. Lodge has not, in our opinion, by any means been so successful."—Nation, xxxvii. 254.

"It is a supplement to the 'Student's Hume,' . . . and it purposely omits the history of England in its review of Europe during the last four centuries. The work, therefore, is maimed and imperfect. . . . Nevertheless it is a good abridgment. . . . It abounds in rich and exact knowledge. . . . It is deficient in philosophic grasp and arrangement."—Acad., xxix. 408.

Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1807–1882. Longfellow's later years, though overshadowed by the sudden death of his wife in 1861, were scarcely less productive than the earlier ones had been. Soon after that event he undertook a translation of Dante's Divine Comedy, and long before this task was completed he resumed the habit of original composition. Nor was there any falling of in the grace, simplicity, and finish which had marked his style from the first, while his popularity steadily increased on both sides of the Atlantic, and has not been eclipsed by that of any of his contemporaries. For biog., see LONGFELLOW, REV. S., infra. 1. The Courtship of Miles Standish, Bost., 1858, 16mo. 2. Tales of a Wayside Inn, Bost., 1863, 16mo. 3. Flower-de-Luce, Bost., 1867, 16mo. 4. (Trans.) The Divine Comedy of Dante Alighieri, Lon. and N. York, 1867, 4to.

"This translation is sufficiently exact to furnish a good test of what is not in Dante for those who might be misled by the license of rhymed versions or the blunders of more or less learned commentators; but it may take time and trouble to get a true feeling of what is in him from its dry, or perhaps captious, and certainly very unidiomatic diction."—Sat. Rev., xxiv. 27.

"Here at last that much suffering reader will find Dante's greatness manifest, and not his greatness only, but his grace, his simplicity, and his affection. Here he will find strength matched with wonderful sweetness, and dignity with quaintness,—Dante of the thirteenth century and Dante of eternity. There has been no attempt to add to or to take from this lofty presence. Opening the book, we stand face to face with the poet, and when his voice ceases we may well marvel if he has not sung to us in his own Tuscan."—W. D. HOWELLS: Nation, iv. 492.

5. The New England Tragedies, Bost., 1868, 16mo.

"His theme is a well-worn one at the best, and perhaps, with all the powers of pleasing which our charming author has at such easy command, it would have been impossible for him to have made anything very interesting out of the Puritan persecution of the Quakers, or the sufferings of the Salem witches and wizards. . . . But whatever success or want of it Mr. Longfellow, as a sentimental narrator of tales in gracefully ornate verse, might have had in retelling the old story, he could not—it was evident beforehand, and is now manifest—succeed either in the dramatist's or the novel-writer's way of dealing with it. He has none of the so-called constructiveness which the dramatist must have, and which the novelist also requires; his skill in reproducing more than the outside of distant times and people and places is of the slightest; he has never conceived a character."—Nation, vii. 331.

6. The Divine Tragedy, Bost., 1871, 12mo.

"Mr. Longfellow has been successful in many fields. . . . We cannot congratulate him on any sort or degree of success here; and yet if Passion Plays come into fashion, which it is likely enough they may do, as fools rush in where angels fear to tread, we do not doubt that his 'Divine Tragedy' will stand in favourable and dignified comparison with most or all of them."—*Sat. 9. The Masque of Pandora, and other Poems, Bost., 1875, 16mo.

"The 'Book of Sonnets,' which forms the last part of the volume, is, to our mind, the best of all. Of the structure and management of the sonnet, which in his hands adheres to the severe correctness of the Italian model, Mr. Longfellow is a perfect master; and the thought, whether under stress of the compact form or by some other sympathetic action, seems here to be cast in a finer and stronger mould than before."—Sat. Rev., xl. 654.

"Of all the contents of the volume, the last part, the 'Book of Sonnets,' is that which shows Mr. Longfellow at his best. . . . In these admirable poems, the poet, the artist, and the man find their fullest expression."—Nation, xxii. 14.

"Longfellow, like all poets who had not any great originality of initiative, was singularly dependent on his subjects for his success; but when his subject suits him, he presents it with the simplicity of a really great classic, with all its points in relief, and with nothing of the self-conscious or artificial tone of one who wants to draw attention to the admirable insight with which he has grasped the situation. He can be very conventional when his subject is conventional. When it is not, but is intrinsically poetical, no one gives us its poetry more free from the impertinences of subjective ecstasy than he. He was not a great poet, but he was a singularly restful, singularly simple-minded, and, whenever his subject suited him, . . . a singularly classical poet, who knew how to prune away every excrescence of irrelevant emotion."—Spectator, lv. 418.

"Longfellow in his voluminous works seems to me not only to be eminent in the style and forms of expression that mark the present age, (an idiocrasy, almost a sickness, of verbal melody,) but to bring what is always dearest as poetry to the general human heart and taste, and probably must be so in the nature of things. He is certainly the sort of bard and counteractant most needed for our materialistic, self-assertive, money-worshipping, Anglo-Saxon races, and especially for the present age in America,—an age tyrannically regulated with reference to the manufacturer, the merchant, the financier, the politician, and the day workman; for whom and among whom he comes as the poet of melody, courtesy, deference,—poet of the mellow twilight of the past in Italy, Germany, Spain, and in Northern Europe, poet of all sympathetic gentleness, and universal poet of women and young people."—WALT WHITMAN: "Death of Longfellow," in Essays from the Critic, 42.

Longfellow, Rev. Samuel, [ante, vol. i., add.,] b. 1819, in Portland, Me.; graduated at Harvard in 1839, and at the Divinity School in 1846; was pastor of a Unitarian congregation in Brooklyn, N.Y., 1853–60; spent some time in Europe, and on his return resided in Cambridge, Mass.; was minister of a church in Germantown, Pa., from 1878 till 1882, when he returned to Cambridge. 1. (Ed.) Life of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow: with Extracts from his Journals and Correspondence, Bost., 1886, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The work is essentially Longfellow's diary, expanded and illustrated in parts by letters. . . . The social feature in Longfellow's life is, perhaps, the leading trait of this work, and its most immortal part; its charm is to be felt, as the editor justly says, only by the perusal of a multitude of details as they follow day by day in the record of the poet's own hand. Scarcely second to this, however, is his friendship and association with books. . . . We have . . . a full and delightful history of the external aspects of a lettered life in a refined society, as it was led by a man who fulfilled his duties in the varied relations of his sphere in a way that made his days beautiful and his memory a humanizing influence upon all who have any perception of the sources of its charm. . . . Nevertheless these volumes are neither a complete account nor a thorough study of Longfellow's life."—Nation, xlii. 301.

"The 'editor' of these volumes has done his work well. The extracts he gives from letters and journals are many, but not superabundant; and the story he tells, if here and there hardly full enough, leaving too much for the reader to trace out for himself, is graphic. The book as a whole gives just that insight into the poet's habits and character which is wanted, and is a good example of what narrative biography should be. . . . Critical biography must not be looked for from a man's brother."—WALTER LEWINS: Acad., xxix. 246.

2. Final Memorials of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Bost., 1887, 8vo.

"The third volume was a needful complement to the other two, which left many little personal traits unnoticed. . . . A more simple and faithful record of Mr. Longfellow's life and writings could not be desired than that furnished by his brother."—Sat. Rev., lxiv. 403.

Lowell, James Russell, D.C.L., LL.D., [ante, vol. i., add.,] editor of the Atlantic Monthly 1857–62, and joint editor of the North American Review 1863–72: U.S. minister to Spain 1877–80, and to England 1880–85; lord rector of the University of Glasgow 1883–84. During his residence in England he delivered many public addresses, including one on occasion of the unveiling of a bust of Coleridge in Westminster Abbey. Since his return to America he has delivered a course of lectures on the English dramatists at the Lowell Institute, 1887, and read papers before public audiences at Chicago and elsewhere. 5. Under the Willows, and other Poems, Bost., 1868, 16mo.

"'Auf Wiedersehen' appears to be . . . free from faults,—a gem without flaw and a gem of pure ray. This is what cannot be said of very many of Mr. Lowell's poems, which too often bear evident marks of haste. . . . Yet, after making whatever abatements it has occurred to us to make in the course of a long acquaintance with Mr. Lowell's poetry, it remains as a duty not to take leave of it on any occasion when it has been spoken of at any length without saying, as a last word, that, taken altogether, we have nothing so good; unless, possibly, we except a little of Emerson,—and to make that exception we are not wholly willing."—Nation, vii. 554.

"The secret of Mr. Lowell's art is an exact fidelity to his impressions. He does not work them up with self-conscious elaboration, nor draw on an artificial imagination, but reproduces with careful simplicity the actual vision and sensation, as they were to him. . . . In two pieces included in the volume before us Mr. Lowell rises to inspired lyric height. The 'Ode to Happiness' is full of suppressed force. . . . But by far the finest piece in the volume is the really noble 'Commemoration Ode.'"—Sat. Rev., xxvii. 23.

7. Among my Books, Bost., 1870, 12mo.

"Containing the deliberate words of perhaps the best of living English critics,—his final judgments on many of the great names of literature; judgments which are the result of long and wide study and reading, of marvellous acuteness of sight and delicacy of sympathy; containing a poet's opinion of other poets, a wit's opinion of other wits; in short, the careful opinions of a man of cultivated genius concerning other men of genius who are near and dear to all of us, but to all of us partly unintelligible without an interpreter,—this book of Mr. Lowell's is one of the best gifts that for many years has come to the world of English literature; and to say this still is to say one of the best gifts that has for many years come to the world of literature."—Nation, x. 258.

"This is a thoroughly charming book. Its freshness and grace, its quiet fun and wide culture, its insight and sound judgment, as well in literature as in politics, put it easily above any similar collection of essays that the English-speaking world has seen for some time."—Ath., No. 2269.

9. Among my Books. Second Series. 1876, 12mo.

"It was worth while to collect these studies of Mr. Lowell; they stand well above the average of critical articles in the Reviews: but none of them possesses a monumental perfection or enduringness."—EDWARD DOWDEN: Acad., ix. 232.

"Few living writers have at once so much knowledge of poetical literature and so much critical power as Mr. Lowell, and certainly none of those who in knowledge and power are his equals would be guilty of the sad faults of taste which he seems to take a positive pleasure in committing."—Sat. Rev., xli. 624.

"The great distinction to be made between the present volume and the ones that have preceded it is the absence of the light, humorous tone and continual discursiveness that used to render Mr. Lowell such pleasant reading for a vacant hour."—Spectator, xlix. 925.

10. Poetical Works: with a Critical Preface by William Michael Rossetti, Lon., 1880, 12mo.

"The judgment delivered by Mr. W. M. Rossetti in his lucid prefatory notice, that Mr. Lowell's chief claim to admiration must rest on his 'Biglow Papers,' cannot be successfully challenged. This fact, however, still permits the conviction that there is present in Mr. Lowell's poetry of thought and sentiment a purity of tone, a tenderness of feeling, a general grace and at times an absolute beauty of expression, which our world would be the poorer for losing."—Ath., No. 2753.

11. Democracy, and other Addresses, Bost., 1886, 16mo.

"Less a reasoned criticism of books or life or institutions than the overflow of an opulent mind. It would be as impossible to submit such work to criticism as it would be unfruitful; and it is unnecessary to notice anew the traits of style, the felicities of phrase, the charm, eloquence, and humor which are familiar to two generations of our people."—Nation, xliii. 525.

13. Political Essays, Bost., 1888, 16mo. (Most of these essays were first published during or soon after the civil war, and relate to the events of that period.)

"It is the political and social moralist sitting in judgment on offences against primal laws; not the politician decrying the men and measures of a rival or hostile party. . . . It is not simply this quality that keeps them fresh to-day; it is, quite as much, that literary charm which pervades all of Mr. Lowell's writings."—Critic, x. 111.

"If interesting primarily to Mr. Lowell's fellow-countrymen, the essays possess value for historical students, and are documents of the course and movement of opinion which shaped the action of the statesmen of the North."—Sat. Rev., lxvi. 147.

A collective edition of his works is now in course of publication.

General Criticism:

"Mr. Lowell's poetry has simply gone on perfecting itself in form and finish, until now he is as complete a specimen of a 'literary man's poet,' of the consummate artist in expression,—whom the lover of the art of expression is hard put to it to judge impartially, from sheer delight in his workmanship,—as it would be easy to find in a summer day's hunt through a well-filled library. . . . As a critic of belles-lettres he has scarcely any living equal; and if we are allowed—as surely we should be—to give more marks for sanity than for any other quality of criticism, he ranks higher, perhaps, than any rival. Great delicacy of perception, and a discriminative faculty, 'piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit' in a piece of literary work, are accompanied, in Mr. Lowell's case, by a most commendable freedom from crotchet and affectation, and a consistent sobriety of judgment."—H. D. Traill: Fortnightly Rev., xliv. 79.

Lubbock, Sir John, Bart., F.R.S., LL.D., D.C.L., b. 1834, in London; son of Sir John William Lubbock, (ante, vol. i.;) became a partner in his father's banking establishment in 1856, and is president of the Institute of Bankers; M.P. for Maidstone 1870–80, and since then for London University. He has taken an active part in financial and educational measures, but is chiefly known as a scientific writer. He is president of the Linnæan Society, vice-president of the Royal Society and the British Association, a trustee of the British Museum, and chairman of the London County Council. He has contributed to the Transactions of learned societies and to the leading reviews. 1. Prehistoric Times as illustrated by Ancient Remains and the Manners and Customs of Modern Savages, Lon., 1865, 8vo; 4th ed., 1878. 2. The Origin of Civilization, and the Primitive Condition of Man, Lon., 1870, 8vo; 3d ed., 1874. (Treats chiefly of family relationship and religion.)

"This interesting and valuable volume illustrates to some extent the way in which the modern scientific spirit manages to extract a considerable treasure from the chaff and refuse neglected or thrown aside by former inquirers. The evidence of savage customs, on which Sir John Lubbock has constructed what is at least a plausible theory of the very earliest condition of human society, has been very generally regarded as too worthless for any conclusions to be founded on it. . . . It has been for the most part collected by persons who had no idea of its importance, and who recorded their stories of savage usages simply to amuse or astonish their readers. . . . But the special importance of Sir J. Lubbock's work arises from the fact that the evidence with which he deals can be multiplied and improved to any extent. . . . The historical order of the ideas which have prevailed among men on the subject of Family Relationship is thus stated by Sir J. Lubbock: 'First, a child is related to his tribe generally; secondly, to his mother, and not to his father; thirdly, to his father, and not to his mother; lastly, and lastly only, he is related to both.' . . . It would seem, therefore, that Sir J. Lubbock's interpretation of the facts which he considers established is precisely the reverse of Mr. Maclennan's. . . . The fault of an otherwise admirable book is the somewhat hasty assumption of an historical relation between classes of ideas not shown by any evidence to have grown out of one another."—*Sat. "Lucas's career suggests, to those who are prepared to profit by them, interesting reflections as to the likenesses and unlikenesses between the religious temperaments necessary to make either good Quakers or good Catholics; and these are emphasized by the information here given as to the way in which he, who was completely converted by a 'flash,' regarded the slow and wavering conversion of Cardinal Newman. . . . The chapters in which these matters are discussed or alluded to, indeed, are, for general reasons, the most interesting in the book."—Ath., No. 3061.

Lyall, Sir Alfred Comyns, K.C.B., K.C.I.E., b. 1835, at Coulston, Surrey; educated at Eton and Haileybury; entered the Bengal civil service 1855, and rose through successive grades to the post of lieutenant-governor of the Northwest Provinces and chief commissioner of Oude 1882; returned to England in 1887, and was appointed a member of the Indian Council 1888. Asiatic Studies, Religious and Social, Lon., 1882, 8vo; 2d ed., 1884.

"By far the larger number of these eleven essays deal with the history of religion, as illustrated by what the author has seen passing under his own eyes in India. . . . Very rarely indeed has any one attained in any single part of it to that intimate acquaintance with currents of religious thought and with changes of society which our author evidently possesses."—Acad., xxii. 356.

"Supplies an admirable corrective to views entertained by the too exclusively philosophical writers and the too purely political administrators respectively."—Sat. Rev., lvi. 347.

"All the evidence which has come to light has been marshalled in this volume, where the most is made of it. It has been here commingled with a large mass of materials possessing little direct bearing upon the question at issue.

The work is, in truth, a large treatise on Post-Tertiary Geology, having the date of the advent of man in view, but often hiding it by the interposition of rocks and formations and phenomena which might have been much more briefly treated."—Ath., No. 1842.

"The volume before us had its origin in circumstances connected with the author's health. He had tried, but in vain, to preach the two sermons which a congregation usually expects from its minister. The idea then suggested itself that he should write down what some of his friends might deliver from the pulpit. . . . Abounding in thought—we would be understood to mean suggestive rather than argumentative thought—beyond all the sermons that we know, they show, to use Mr. Cox's words, 'a more discriminate use of the inexhaustible wealth of his intellect and imagination'" [than his extemporaneous discourses.]—Spectator, xlv. 148.

12. Kenelm Chillingly: his Adventures and Opinions, Lon., 1873, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. Posth.

"The story is an odd mixture of really shrewd and able writing and the flimsiest sentimental philosophy."—Sat. Rev., xxxv. 456.

"It is, perhaps, the pleasantest of all Lord Lytton's books; it contains the tenderest of his pictures, perhaps the most truly poetical of his poems, many admirable specimens of his wit, and far less than almost any other of his works of his tinselly rhodomontade."—Spectator, xlvi. 476.

13. The Parisians. Illust. Lon., 1873, 4 vols. cr. 8vo; new ed., 1874, 2 vols. 12mo.

"Lord Lytton's last three novels . . . form a group by themselves. They are all intended to signalize the danger of certain political and social theories. The 'Coming Race' did this by means of purely fanciful symbols; 'Kenelm Chillingly' was a psychological romance, and 'The Parisians' is a didactic novel. . . . With much good portraiture and some clever writing upon political and social topics, it does not produce a satisfactory impression."—Sat. Rev., xxxvi. 815.

"'The Parisians' is its author's ripest work. . . . Graces of style, acquired by long labour, have grown into second nature. Egotism has disappeared in a species of gentle, genial epicureanism. We have the last novel of a novelist who, conscious of the lapse of time, is consciously writing for posterity. Many will read it often, none need regret to have carefully read it once."—Ath., No. 2409.

15. Pausanias, the Spartan: an Unfinished Historical Romance. By the Late Lord Lytton. Edited by his Son. Lon., 1876, cr. 8vo.

"The characters rant like Arbaces, and his love-scenes and the political scenes are alike stagy and wearisome."—Ath., No. 2519.

Lytton, Edward Robert Lytton Bulwer-, Earl of Lytton, G.C.B., G.C.S.I., C.I.E., b. 1831; son of Baron Lytton, supra; educated at Harrow, and at the University of Bonn; entered the diplomatic service as attaché at Washington 1849; secretary at Lisbon 1865, at Madrid and at Vienna 1868, and at Paris 1872–74; envoy to Portugal 1874–76; governor-general of India 1876–80; ambassador at Paris since 1887; created an earl 1880. His earlier works were published under the pseudonyme of "Owen Meredith," (q. v., ante, vol. ii.) 1. Clytemnestra, and other Poems, Lon., 1859, cr. 8vo. 2. The Wanderer: a Collection of Poems in Many Lands, Lon., 1859, cr. 8vo; new ed., 1876.

"Some of the poems may match in beauty of language and grace of thought with such masterpieces of music as Herrick's, Carew's, Marvel's, Tennyson's, Moore's, or Edgar Poe's. They are, in fact, 'lilies without, roses within.' The fibres of the poet's life are seen through them as lucidly as the roots of a hyacinth are seen through glass."—Ath., No. 1632.

3. Lucile: a Poem, Lon., 1860, cr. 8vo; new ed., illust., 1868.

"The tale will enchain those who take it up, if even they conceive that it might as well have been told in prose as in verse, and if even they object, so strongly as ourselves, to the lighter portions, on the same principle as made us regret the colloquialisms of Mrs. Browning's novel."—Ath., No. 1695.

"It is based upon supernatural incidents, and is more or less garnished with something in the nature of metaphysics. . . . It is very natural that a man who writes such things should like to call himself Owen Meredith, and to put a sham German doctor between his pseudonyme and his novel."—Sat. Rev., xvi. 294.

"An attempt to popularize among English readers a dramatic poem, the 'Infernal Comedy,' written by Count Sigismund Krasinski, the Anonymous Poet of Poland. . . . It is a relief to turn to the minor pieces in the volume, most of which are eminently readable."—Sat. Rev., xxvii. 287.

"To write the life of such a man is no easy task. The abundance of the material in some respects increases the difficulty. Where so much is known, it is not easy to make a selection, and the Earl of Lytton can only in two volumes arrive at his father's twenty-ninth year. . . . Readers of these volumes will perhaps be disappointed if they expect much new light to be thrown upon the late Lord Lytton's character and doings."—Sat. Rev., lvi. 836.

13. Glenaveril; or, The Metamorphoses. Six Books. Lon., 1885, 2 vols. 12mo.

"To have written a poem in six books at once entertaining, witty, and capable of enchaining the reader's interest, is a triumph of literary skill, even if the work in question should in truth be more of a novel in verse than a genuine poem. . . . The earnest student of poetry will, no doubt, feel the lack of sincerity in 'Glenaveril,' which, in spite of its fertility of invention and brilliancy of dialogue, may strike some as monstrous in mere invention. He will miss the power of evolving typical forms 'more real than living man' from the shifting world around, and that incommunicable gift of turning each word that drops from the poet's mouth into the pearls and precious stones of speech. But apart from these rare and superlative qualities, 'Glenaveril' may be said to possess most of the merits which a mere narrative poem can possess. It touches on a wonderful variety of topics, the burning questions and most picturesque characteristics of the day, while rarely losing sight of the central idea, . . . the inevitable law of heredity."—Ath., No. 3018.

"There is much in this book that recalls the author's striking and beautiful 'Fables in Song.' It does not, I think, on the whole, maintain so high a level; but it has the same special merit, the same mixture of romantic thought with piercing aperçus from life and experience, reminding one of the finer work of the elder Lord Lytton, —the same defect, as I venture to think it, of mingling real poetry with a hard and gritty humour, a crackling of thorns under a pot."—E. "Mr. McCarthy has industriously gone over the early part of Shelley's life; he has carefully investigated the statements which have hitherto passed current with biographers; he has detected many errors; and he has discovered a few new facts which will have to take their place in future lives of Shelley. At the same time the book is interesting rather to Dryasdust than to the general reader."—Sat. Rev., xxxv. 120.

"Mr. McCarthy's book is not very easy for consecutive reading. . . . It is, however, a laborious and a thoroughly genuine accession to the biographical materials regarding Shelley, and will remain indispensable to all students of this period of his life."—W. M. Rossetti: Acad., iii. 442.

MacCarthy, Justin, b. 1830, at Cork, Ireland, and educated at a private school in that city; was connected with the Cork Examiner and the Liverpool Northern Times, and in 1860 became Parliamentary reporter on the London Morning Star, of which he was editor in 1864–68. During the next three years he travelled in the United States. In 1879 he was elected M.P. for Longford, Ireland. He was re-elected in 1880 and chosen vice-president of the Home Rule party in Parliament, and in 1885, after being defeated at Derry, was again elected at Longford. "Mr. McCarthy is a brilliant historical improvisatore. He is not a great historian. His sparkling book is popular now, and will remain popular for some time. But whether its popularity will prove less ephemeral than that of 'Essays and Reviews,' for instance, is quite another question." —Spectator, liii. 1315.

"On the whole, this history 'of our own times'—which is, however, only a history of England in our time—is written for readers more or less familiar with the events and the personages of the period, and is intended to amuse and enlighten them by interesting and lucid summaries rather than to instruct them about particulars."—Nation, xxxi. 33.

The Personal Memoirs and Military History of U. S. Grant versus the Record of the Army of the Potomac, Bost., 1887, 12mo.

"What is, in fact, given is . . . a series of quotations from Grant and Badeau, compared with others from Humphreys, connected by a running comment, in which the proof of error in the first two books is supposed to be complete when their disagreement with the last is exhibited."—Nation, xlvii. 276.

MacClellan, George Brinton, [ante, vol. ii., add.,] 1826–1885, b. in Philadelphia; graduated at the U.S. Military Academy 1846; served in the Mexican war; was afterwards employed as engineer in the West, and in 1855 was sent to Europe as a member of a military commission to report on the condition of the European armies. In April, 1861, he was appointed major-general of Ohio volunteers, a month later major-general in the regular army, and from November of that year till April, 1862, he was commander of all the U.S. armies. He commanded the Army of the Potomac until July, and again from September to November, when he was relieved and his military career came to an end. In 1864 he resigned his commission and was the Democratic candidate for the presidency of the United States. He was engineer-in-chief of the department of the docks of New York City 1870–72, and governor of New Jersey 1877–78. 1. Report on the Seat of War in Europe, 1855–56, Wash., 1857, 4to. 2. The Life and Campaigns of Major-General J. E. B. Stuart, Commander of the Cavalry of the Army of Northern Virginia, Richmond and Bost., 1885, 8vo.

"This volume fills, and fills well, a gap in the literature connected with the civil war. . . . The tone of Major McClellan's book deserves unqualified praise. . . . The style . . . is admirable for its lucidness and ease. . . . Major McClellan is not excelled by any writer we know in the clearness with which he sets forth the movements of troops before battle, and the well-defined, perfectly comprehensible picture he presents of battles themselves."—Nation, xlii. 41.

"A fairer, kindlier book was never written. . . . The Princess and the Goblin, Lon., 1871, 12mo; new ed., 1884. 21. Wilfrid Cumbermede: an Autobiographical Story, Lon., 1871, 3 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1884.

"A really beautiful book, which will delight Mr. Macdonald's great circle of admirers,—we had almost said disciples,—and by which those who profess a sterner and more definite religious philosophy may come to understand the secret of his acceptance as a popular teacher."—Spectator, xlv. 280.

22. The Vicar's Daughter, Lon., 1872, 3 vols. cr. 8vo; new ed., 1881. 23. Gutta-Percha Willie, the Working Genius. Illust. Lon., 1873, 12mo. 24. Malcolm, Lon., 1874, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"No educated reader can fail to be touched by such landscapes and characters as abound in the book."—Ath., No. 2459.

"The faults to be found with 'Malcolm' are by no means equal to its beauties. Since the days of Miss Ferrier there has been no better picture of Scotch character in many varieties."—Sat. Rev., xxxix. 573.

"It is impossible not to study with interest the play of human action and passion as he delineates them. Whether we watch the mad laird till, with Malcolm, we feel for him a strong and painful sympathy; . . . or trace the growing development of character . . . in the tantalizing Lady Florimel, or the by-play of complicated motive and interest, as it moves the various characters which are crowded on the stage, . . . it is plain at least that in this united history Mr. Macdonald has given us a story which, notwithstanding the fact that we conceive its main plot unworthy of his pen, will yet be extensively read and its sequel eagerly looked for."—Spectator, xlviii. 344.

25. The Wise Woman: a Parable, Lon., 1875, p. 8vo; new ed., 1885. 26. St. George and St. Michael, Lon., 1875, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 27. Thomas Wingfold, Curate, Lon., 1876, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 28. Exotics: Translations from Novalis, Luther, &c., Lon., 1876, 12mo. 29. The Marquis of Lossie, Lon., 1877, 3 vols. p. 8vo. (Sequel to "Malcolm.")

"It is not a realistic story; the incidents are improbable, and the final salvation of all the contending parties impossible, as the world goes; but the book adds another to many chapters of the high teaching which may be utilized even by such as object to its form and disagree with much of its matter."—Ath., No. 2591.

"Although Mr. Macdonald has made us wait two whole years for the second part of his novel, we find ourselves taking it up with rather an increase than an abatement of interest. . . . The cause of this is that Mr. Macdonald's characters are real people. There is life in their every gesture, in their every tone of expression, and he has also a wonderful way of depicting, as it were, the hidden nature of man or woman, and revealing to us things of which we have, perhaps, been vaguely conscious, but which have never before taken distinct shape; and the occasional introduction of metaphysical discussion into the thread of the story, which is an unfailing characteristic of this writer, is in the present instance an additional charm."—Spectator, l. 1243.

30. Paul Faber, Surgeon, Lon., 1878, 3 vols. cr. 8vo.

"The book is not without dramatic interest, but this is small in quantity, though powerful and telling; and the main force of Dr. Macdonald's genius is spent on dialogue, reflection, and sermon."—Spectator, lii. 118.

31. Sir Gibbie, Lon., 1879, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"With the exception of 'Within and Without,' and the first volume of 'David Elginbrod,' we are of opinion that 'Sir Gibbie,' take it for all in all, is the finest production of his pen. . . . Written, as it has been, for a great and serious purpose,—it is, in fact, a special study of psychological evolution,—much thought and labour must have gone to the construction of it. But, all the same, the story has the freshness and charm of an improvisation, from beginning to end, but an improvisation shaped, coloured, and directed to the ideal end."—Spectator, lii. 1415.

"Every one remembers the story of how, when Coleridge asked Charles Lamb whether he had ever heard him preach, Lamb replied that he had never heard Coleridge do anything else. Draw from this saying its little sting of sarcasm, and allow for its humorous exaggeration, and it fits Mr. Macdonald quite as well as it fitted the great man who called it forth. . . . The first series of 'Unspoken Sermons' has not, we think, been estimated at its true value, save by a comparatively small number of readers. It was a really remarkable book. . . . We cannot say that we think the present volume quite equal to its predecessor."—Spectator, lviii. 852.

Travels in the Slavonic Provinces of Turkey in Europe, Lon., 1867, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., rev., with a Preface by the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P., 1877.

"The distinguished writer of the Preface to this book gives it as his opinion that, as regards the true condition of certain subject races of the Ottoman Empire, 'no diplomatist, no consul, no traveller, among our countrymen, has made such a valuable contribution to our means of knowledge . . . as was made by Miss Mackenzie and Miss Irby when they published, in 1867, their travels in some of the Slavonian Provinces of European Turkey.' . . . For universal acceptance, the fiat must be limited to the acquisition of data, the portrayal of outer life and landscape, and, it may be, literary power. Political views and conclusions form a separate consideration, and will be judged according to the political bias of the reader."—J. GOLDSMID: Acad., xii. 55.

MacLennan, John Ferguson, M.A., LL.D., 1827–1881; was educated at King's College, Aberdeen, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was admitted to the Scottish bar, but lost half his practice through the publication of the work which gained him distinction as an anthropologist, and thenceforth devoted himself to scientific and antiquarian studies. In 1871 he went to London and was appointed Parliamentary draughtsman, a post which he resigned a few years later on a change of government. His researches opened up a new line of study in regard to primitive manners and customs. 1. Primitive Marriage: an Inquiry into the Origin of the Form of Capture in Marriage Ceremonies, Lon. and Edin., 1865, p. 8vo.

"The object of this work on 'Primitive Marriage' is not simply to exhibit the almost universal prevalence of the form of capture, as proved by its actual existence in barbarous tribes, and its symbolical existence in civilized customs, but also to exhibit the new relations it reveals of the early constitution of society. . . . The author has diligently and skilfully collected the evidence which still exists, in order by it to interpret the history of what has been. . . . Our author is led to many interesting speculations on the early forms of society, in which he endeavours to show that the most ancient system in which the idea of blood-relationship was embodied admitted kinship through females only. . . . Mr. McLennan has opened a new path in historical research. Those who follow may have to modify his conclusions on some points, but all philosophic students will gratefully acknowledge his services as a pioneer."—Sat. Rev., xix. 232.

"Drummond 'is principally known to the outer world by his invention of the "Drummond Light." and his authorship of a phrase which has been often repeated and criticised,—"Property has its duties as well as its rights."' . . . On the whole, an interesting and useful work."—Sat. Rev., xxiv. 88, 193.

3. Studies in Ancient History: comprising a Reprint of "Primitive Marriage," &c., Lon., 1876, p. 8vo.

"The object of the essay 'Kinship in Ancient Greece' is to test in the case of the Greeks the validity of the history of kinship and the family set forth in 'Primitive Marriage.' Mr. McLennan is of opinion that he has at least made out a case calling for an answer from people, like Sir Henry Maine, who stand upon the old lines; and, without going into criticism, perhaps this much may be admitted to him. He has put his scheme to a further test in his essay on the classificatory system of Relationships. But a whole article would be needed for an account of this long and closely-reasoned paper. We must confine ourselves to saying that he seems to have utterly demolished the theories of Mr. Morgan,—by whom the facts relating to the classificatory system were collected,—and shown that it does not denote systems of relationship at all, but systems of addresses, for use in social intercourse among people, with many of whom it would be much more than impoliteness to address a man by his real name."—Spectator, l. 476

"Since the first edition of Mr. McLennan's book appeared, the subject has employed many pens, and it would not have been difficult to find much corroborative evidence to show the survival of a symbol of capture in the marriage ceremonies of several European lands inhabited by Aryan peoples. The Slavonic side of the question, for instance, has been most carefully examined by several scholars, mostly Russian. . . . The weight of this Slavonic evidence being in favour of Sir John Lubbock's hypothesis of a primeval universal community of women, and not at all supporting Mr. McLennan's supposed system of polyandry, might render the latter less inclined to put it upon record than if it bore witness to marriage by capture only."—W. R. S. RALSTON: Acad., xi. 479.

4. The Patriarchal Theory: based on the Papers of the Late J. F. MacLennan. Edited and completed by Donald MacLennan. Lon., 1884, 8vo.

"'The Patriarchal Theory' has been constructed partly out of chapters which Mr. McLennan himself helped to draw up, partly out of his scattered notes, partly by aid of the original researches and conclusions of his brother. . . . It can be neglected by no one who pretends to speak with authority in questions of the development of society."—Sat. Rev., lix. 85.

"While every one must admit that the brothers McLennan have advanced their subject by discussion and criticism, their arguments are often wiredrawn into a controversial minuteness hardly suited to reasoning on social systems for the most part imperfectly understood. . . . It will be through many partial hypotheses, some upset by criticism and others standing their ground, that we may hope to have the whole theory of primitive society some day worked out. At present the part of it which converging research seems to establish is the doctrine of an early general prevalence of the system of kinship on the female side."—E. B. TYLOR: Acad., xxviii. 67.

Reminiscences and Selections from his Diaries and Letters. Edited by Sir [William] Frederick Pollock, Bart., one of his Executors, Lon., 1875, 2 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1876, 1 vol.

"The record of Macready's struggles, as recorded by him in these 'Reminiscences,' is full of interest, both as regards the man and the great art to which he dedicated his life. . . . As a careful and for the most part a just estimate of the stage during a very brilliant period, the attraction of these volumes can scarcely be surpassed. Readers also who have no special interest in theatrical matters, but who enjoy miscellaneous gossip, will be allured from page to page, attracted by familiar names and by observations upon popular actors and authors."—Spectator, xlviii. 562.

"This book has not merely a dramatic but a general interest; it not only vividly relates old experiences, it enforces much valuable teaching. . . . "All those parts of his book . . . which come properly under the head of 'Rambles' are very pleasant and very spirited reading. . . . Prof. Mahaffy's studies are not sound as far as they go; and inexact statement, inapt illustration, and random criticism are good neither to awaken the public nor to put the beginner on his way."—SIDNEY COLVIN: Acad., xi. 70.

"The book is biographical rather than historical in character. It wants continuity, and does not sufficiently explain the mutual influence of the various authors. . . . Regarded as a contribution to our critical knowledge of the great Greek writers, and not as a means of educating youth, the book deserves very high praise."—Sat. Rev., l. 429.

"Mr. Mahaffy is the agreeable Rattle among professors. He always writes with animation, whereas most professors write with languor. He always speaks as the bitter enemy of 'pedants,' seeming to draw a line between himself and other learned persons, and to exclaim, 'Here you see a man of the world, no mere Dryasdust.' By virtue of these charms of manner, Mr. Mahaffy has written a very lively book, chiefly on Greek education, with digressions about Irish girls and the hall and library of the Four Courts at Dublin. . . . The book . . . does not do much to elucidate the problems over which poor pedants read themselves blind."—Sat. Rev., liii. 50.

There is, however, an attractive mystery about the volume. Who is Dr. Mahan? We do not know, and he does not tell us; and yet he tells us that he had the ear of the President, Secretary Chase, Messrs. "This is a very fine collection of English sonnets. and, as far as we know, omits none which would be unquestionably regarded by all good critics as of the first rank in power and beauty. . . . Maine, Sir Henry James Sumner, K.C.S.I., D.C.L., LL.D., F.R.S., 1822–1888, educated at Pembroke College, Oxford, where his career was an exceptionally brilliant one. He graduated in 1844 with the highest honors, and, no Fellowship being vacant at Pembroke College, accepted a tutorship at Trinity Hall. In 1847 he was elected Regius professor of civil law at Cambridge University. In 1850 he was called to the bar, and in 1854 he resigned his chair at Cambridge to become reader on jurisprudence at the Middle Temple. In 1862 he was appointed law member of the Supreme Government in India, returned to England in 1869, and was elected Corpus professor of jurisprudence at Oxford in 1869. In 1871 he was appointed a member of the council of the secretary of state for India. In 1877 he was elected master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and in 1887 Whewell professor of international law. He was Rede lecturer at Cambridge in 1875, and in 1883 was elected a Foreign Associate of the French Academy of Moral and Political Sciences. 1. Ancient Law: its Connection with the Early History of Society and its Relation to Modern Ideas, Lon., 1861, 8vo; 9th ed., 1883.

"This volume will mark an era in the history of jurisprudence. When it makes its way among the jurists of the Continent, they will find in it some ideas with which they are familiar, others for the reception of which they are prepared, many substantially or absolutely new to them, and they will find them all exhibited in a shape which is a greater novelty abroad than any of the contents can be. Mr. Maine's book is evidently the result of much thought on very difficult subjects; it is full of recondite and various learning, and abounds with the suggestions of a most prolific and subtle ingenuity; and yet the discourse is made to flow on in an easy and lucid current, and the discussion of separate points is always kept subordinate to a whole that seems simple and intelligible . . . But when a book written as this is is used as a text-book, care ought to be taken to show how very slight the evidence frequently is on which any opinion as to the details of the history of jurisprudence can be grounded."—*Sat. 2. Village Communities in the East and West: Six Lectures delivered at Oxford, Lon., 1871, 8vo; 3d ed., 1876. (The 3d ed. includes several addresses, essays, and lectures previously published.)

"The mind of the reader is kept continually on the stretch, . . . and every page tells him something. The conspicuous merits of the book are . . . that it throws new and most valuable light on the original facts of English law through the aid of parallel facts observable in existing though rapidly fading forms of society in India; . . . and, lastly, that it perpetually enlivens the reader by the variety of the problems which, in passing, it raises, discusses, and offers to solve."—Sat. Rev., xxxi. 438.

"His speculations will have interest both for the lawyer and the ethnologist, though in their present form they are perhaps hardly sufficiently supported by details of positive evidence."—Ath., 2268.

3. The Effect of Observation of India on Modern European Thought, (Rede Lecture,) Lon., 1875.

"Sir H. Maine undertakes, in this essay, to show in a few rapid touches all that we owe to the knowledge of India, and the picture is striking. . . . Sir H. Maine expresses, in conclusion, the conviction that India will become subject to the influence of Western ideas, and that, in spite of the obstinate resistance of national prejudices, it will enter into the movement which we call modern progress."—Acad., viii. 157.

4. Lectures on the Early History of Institutions, Lon., 1875, 8vo.

"He has at last constructed a theory of the history of early institutions which will be criticised, amplified, and perhaps modified by subsequent investigators, but which cannot fail to be the central theory on which others will have to work."—Sat. Rev., xxxix. 83.

"The first ten of these remarkable lectures are occupied mainly with investigations suggested by the ancient Irish law tracts published by the Brehon Law Commission. . . . In the hands of a scholar of first-rate juristical genius, conversant both with the history of Teutonic law and with the usages and jurisprudence of India, the Brehon law tracts throw a flood of new light on early Aryan society in all its branches, Asiatic and European, and on the causes which made the laws of the Germanic nations, including the English, pursue a path of development quite different from that followed by both the Hindoos and the Irish."—Ath., No. 2464.

5. Dissertations on Early Law and Custom: chiefly selected from Lectures delivered at Oxford, Lon, 1883, 8vo.

"Although the work includes such a wide range of topics as that indicated by the titles of the various chapters, . . . there is one subject which stands out prominently as the main thread of the work. This may perhaps be roughly designated as early Aryan society."—Ath., No. 2892.

"The chapter entitled 'Some Theories of Primitive Society' may be described as a considered manifesto of the historical as against the savage school of social archæology."—Sat. Rev., lv. 409.

"The student will still admire the author's resolute adherence to the historical method in a region of inquiry offering the greatest temptation to theory and conjecture, the wide range of his vision over the whole domain of history and law, and the keen penetration with which he associates and interprets facts apparently the most widely severed, and which enables him to discuss some problems affecting the origin of human society with the same skill, if not with the same confidence, that he evinced in dealing with the Edicts of the Prætors."—Spectator, lvi. 971.

"The conclusion . . . to which the reader is inevitably conducted is that the language used by Morgan and McLellan does 'lead to a good deal of confusion of thought.' Their views are displaced rather than confuted, and Sir Henry Maine's readers are convinced not only of the soundness of his own theories, but also of the intellectual calmness which marks his judgment."—Nation, xxxvii. 165.

6. Popular Government: Four Essays, Lon., 1885, 8vo; 2d ed. same year. (Consists of articles published originally in the Quarterly Review.)

"The purpose of these four essays is to warn the English people of the risks they run in yielding to the democratic craze which has been growing for nearly a hundred years, and to urge them, if they must yield, to do so as discreetly as possible. . . . He plays too much with his subject in three desultory and disjointed articles on 'The Prospects of Popular Government,' 'The Nature of Democracy,' and 'The Age of Progress.' These articles but inadequately lead up to the conclusion which, strange to say, is set forth in the essay on 'The Constitution of the United States,' a notable and very suggestive panegyric of American Republicanism, as a great advance in statesmanship on anything that English Radicals have as yet proposed."—Ath., No. 3027.

"Some at least of these essays were, on their anonymous appearance, attributed to Lord Salisbury, but what was then high praise seems now like the bitterest satire. . . . More ingenious than profound, more epigrammatic than original, more dazzling than persuasive, this work would be worthier of the present Prime Minister than of the author of 'Ancient Law.' . . . The history of government is studied apart from the more general history of society and civilization; with the result that the whole subject is thrown into uncertainty and confusion."—ALFRED W. BENN: Acad., xxviii. 300.

"Its drift is, that democracy is a mere form of government, and a form which, like other schemes of polity, may pass away. While it exists, our true wisdom is, our teacher suggests, to make the best of a somewhat indifferent piece of political mechanism. The lesson may be sound or unsound, but, whatever be its intrinsic merits, it singularly suits the prevalent temper of the nation and class to which it is addressed."—Nation, xlii. 281.

7. International Law: being the Whewell Lectures delivered before the University of Cambridge in 1887, Lon., 1888, 8vo. Posth.

"The book is not to be regarded as one more in the long list of text-books dealing exhaustively with the subject; and it may be suspected that there would have been modifications, as well as additions, if the author had lived to publish a complete work on International Law. But, such as it is, this collection of lectures is a valuable contribution to the literature of the subject, the more so because Sir Henry Maine's peculiar power of adding a charm to subjects unattractive at first sight, and of leading the general educated public into paths previously sacred to the specialist or the student, has in 'International Law' a peculiarly suitable field for its application."—Spectator, lxi. 1775.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"One of the greatest charms of Sir Henry Maine's writings is the extraordinary way in which he sets his readers thinking for themselves: he opens up a problem in a masterly manner, lays hold of the salient points, and states these in the clearest language, and then he leaves the reader to work out for himself innumerable interesting speculations which have been in the first place suggested for him."—Ath., No. 2892.

"For the present we may at least say, looking to our own science of law, that the impulse given by Maine to its intelligent study in England and America can hardly be overrated. Within living memory the Common Law was treated merely as a dogmatic and technical system. Historical explanation, beyond the dates and facts which were manifestly necessary, was regarded as at best an idle ornament, and all singularities and anomalies had to be taken as they stood, either without any reason or (perhaps oftener) with a bad one. . . . A certain amount of awakening was no doubt effected by the analytical school, as Maine taught us to call it. . . . But the scientific study of legal phenomena such as we really find them had no place among us. . . . Maine not only showed that this was a possible study, but showed that it was not less interesting and fruitful than any in the whole range of the moral sciences. At one master-stroke he forged a new and lasting bond between law, history, and anthropology. Jurisprudence itself has become a study of the living growth of human society through all its stages, and it is no longer possible for law to be dealt with as a collection of rules imposed on societies as it were by accident, nor for the resemblances and differences of the laws of different societies to be regarded as casual."—SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK: Oxford Lectures and Other Discourses, p. 158.

Maitland, Edward, b. 1824, at Ipswich, Eng.; brother of Rev. Brownlow Maitland, supra, and of Dr. Charles Maitland, (ante, vol. ii.;) graduated at Caius College, Cambridge, 1847. He had intended to take holy orders, but, becoming engaged in a train of intellectual speculation, he went abroad, and after ten years, spent chiefly in California and Australia, returned to England and devoted himself to literature, "with the dominant aim of so developing the intuitional faculty as to find the solution of all problems having their basis in man's spiritual nature, with a view to the formulation of a perfect system of thought and rule of life." His efforts towards the attainment of this end were greatly facilitated by the renunciation of flesh food and all stimulating articles of diet, "the result of the change (which was made at the suggestion of Mrs. Anna Kingsford) being so to sensitize the mental surfaces as to vastly enhance the faculty of ideation and convert thought into perception." 1. "The anonymous editor—the Master of the Ceremonies, as he calls himself in the short preface, who simply introduces 'parties whom he deems worthy of each other's acquaintance,' and then retires—tells us that the book is 'the simple record of an actual life of our day.' We see no reason to disbelieve him. The simplicity of the story, its very want of concentration, the earnestness and evident sincerity with which the field of speculation is delved and dug, give a great air of reality to the whole performance. . . . We recognize in the author of 'The Pilgrim and the Shrine' an artist who approaches very near to the ideal that his brilliant pages disclose."—Sat. Rev., xxv. 181.

"Whether we regard it as a book of travels, or the true history of a romantic life, or a thoughtful and philosophical essay, it is equally remarkable and attractive."—Ath., No. 2106.

"It is not often that a biographer has been so fortunate in the choice of a subject for his pen as Mr. Major has been in his selection of Prince Henry. In the first place, it is one never before handled by an English writer; next, it is one for which there was a reasonable amount of materials at hand; and, finally, the hero himself is one well worthy of the labour bestowed in chronicling his actions and delineating his character. . . . On the whole, Mr. Major's 'Life of Prince Henry' is a piece of good work, and of high mark in European letters."—Ath., No. 2106.

He devotes about three hundred and fifty pages to the history of the Afghans down to the ascendency of the Barukzyes, and leaves only a hundred for the first British invasion, for the policy of abstention after our retirement in 1842, and for the more stirring events of the last two years."—*Sat. 8vo. 12. The Founders of the Indian Empire, Clive, Hastings, and Wellesley: Lord Clive, Lon., 1882, 8vo.

"The style is good. The descriptions of military manœuvres are always clear: and the character of the soldier and the statesman is drawn with discrimination and candour. . . . Colonel Malleson has turned out a piece of literary research and workmanship which ought to afford some instruction and pleasure to readers who have not time to hunt up Malcolm, and who would like to know the exact evidence on which some of Macaulay's brilliant essay rests."—Spectator, lv. 119.

13. The Decisive Battles of India, from 1746 to 1849 inclusive: with a Portrait of the Author, a Map, and Three Plans, Lon., 1883, 8vo; 2d ed., enl., 1885.

"We know of no book so well calculated. . . for giving the student a clear and comprehensive knowledge of the successive steps taken in conquering for ourselves the empire of Hindostan. . . . The causes which led to each war are set forth, and the connection between successive wars is clearly shown."—Sat. Rev., lvii. 421.

"It strikes one as the best thing he has yet done. Searching, yet easy, his pen goes with unflagging power through the military wonders of a hundred years, connecting the accounts of battles by a sufficient historic thread."—H. G. Keene: Acad., xxiii. 233.

"The author does not confine himself to the narrative of the manœuvres of each engagement, but gives a clear résumé of events and of the causes at issue. . . . At the same time the incidents of each battle are recorded with a degree of exactitude that would be hard to understand unless we knew of the author's intimate acquaintance with German literature and with the scenes of which he writes. It will be admitted that Colonel Malleson has shown a grasp of his subject and a power of vivifying the confused passages of battle in which it would be impossible to name any living writer as his equal."—Demetrius Boulger: Acad., xxvi. 72.

"For purely instructive purposes he has deliberately tied his own hands, and thought less of giving a treatise on a branch of the art of war than of producing a series of picturesque fragments of military history."—Ath., No. 3017.

19. Prince Eugene of Savoy, Lon., 1888, p. 8vo.

"He has gathered information from a hundred sources, and his descriptions of some of Eugene's campaigns add largely to what was already known, and are remarkable for their clearness and insight. . . . The narrative is of unequal merit; . . . it abounds too much in details, and is somewhat deficient in breadth and outline."—W. O'Connor Morris: Acad., xxxiv. 127.

Mallet, Robert, [ante, vol. ii., add.,] 1810–1881, b. in Dublin; graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, 1830; became an engineer and made a special study of seismology, and, in conjunction with J. W. Mallet, published many Reports to the British Association. The Neapolitan Earthquake of 1857: First Principles of Observational Seismology. Illust. Lon., 1862, 2 vols. r. 8vo.

"Any one who looked for the first time at the ruins of a town overthrown by a violent shock of earthquake would laugh at the idea of extracting from that mass of confused piled-up rubbish any substantial information as to the precise subterranean centre of disturbance, or the character of the earthquake oscillations. Yet this was the task which Mr. Mallet, with the support of the Royal Society, undertook to perform. . . . The result of the expedition is given in two large volumes, magnificently illustrated with photographs. . . . If we are to take his own estimate of the success of his investigations, we must admit that he has ascertained with precision the exact position, depth, and even form, of the great internal fissure. . . . He gives us, in addition, measures of the amplitude and velocity of the seismic perturbation, which he evidently relies on with the most absolute confidence. . . . There is no doubt that he has proved that a science of seismology is capable of being built up . . . to an extent which would scarcely have been anticipated."—Sat. Rev., xv. 215.

Mallock, William Hurrell, b. 1849; son of Rev. Roger Mallock, of Cockington Court, South Devon, Eng., and nephew on his mother's side of the historian James Anthony Froude; was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, where he gained the Newdigate prize in 1871 by a poem on the Isthmus of Suez and took a second class in the final classical schools. He has contributed to the Contemporary Review, Nineteenth Century, and other periodicals. 1. Every Man his Own Poet; or, The Inspired Singer's Recipe-Book. By a Newdigate Prizeman. Oxf., 1872, 8vo. Anon. 2. The New Republic; or, Culture, Faith, and Philosophy in an English Country House, Lon., 1877, 2 vols. p. 8vo. Anon. New eds., 1879, 1883.

"A thinly-veiled parody of the opinions, manners, and personal appearance of a number of living persons famous in the world of science and letters. . . . The nameless author has an epigrammatic knack which would be admirable if it were better directed. . . . When we have picked out a few epigrammatic sentences, and admitted the smartness of the style and of some of the likenesses, we have said almost all that can be said in favour of the 'New Republic.'"—*Sat. 3. The New Paul and Virginia; or, Positivism on an Island, Lon., 1878, cr. 8vo.

"The entire story consists in the characters repeating over and over again certain phrases of Prof. Tyndall's and Mr. Frederic Harrison's, and performing practical jokes of the most meaningless and farcical kind. Of genuine humour there is not a trace; of wit there is not a scintillation, though there is much elaboration of epigram."—Ath., No. 2647.

4. Lucretius, ("Ancient Classics for English Readers,") Edin. and Lon., 1878, 12mo.

"If a considerable faculty for smart writing, an entire want of insight and sympathy, and a perfect omission of anything like real diligence, are qualifications for setting before English readers the spirit of the most profound and one of the greatest of Roman poets, then is Mr. Mallock excellently qualified for the task he has now undertaken."—*Sat. 5. Is Life Worth Living? Lon., 1879, 8vo; new ed., 1880.

"Working on the lines of Butler, Mr. Mallock seeks to show that modern thought fails to solve the problem which the older speculation frankly confesses its inability to solve. That natural atheology has the same logical inconsequences as revealed religion, is the argument of Mr. Mallock's New Analogy."—Ath., No. 2695.

"While we are continually struck with the logical force and adequacy, as well as the literary power, of two-thirds of this volume, we are almost as much struck with the inadequacy, the logical weakness, and not unfrequently even the literary feebleness, of the conclusion."—Spectator, lii. 884.

7. A Romance of the Nineteenth Century, Lon., 1881, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"A book with a misleading title, since it has no single touch of romance. It has instead a good deal of nauseous and quasi-religious sentimentality, a good deal of snobbishness, a good deal of 'the height of fine writing,' and a great deal of very unpleasant and very tedious suggestiveness."—*Sat. 8. Social Equality: a Short Study in a Missing Science, Lon., 1882, p. 8vo.

"Mr. Mallock is only fighting with shadows in the present book, and that because he has not studied sufficiently the missing science—of human character. . . . The knowledge displayed by him of economics is very scanty and antiquated, while his whole line of argument is rendered feeble by the absence of any reference to a definite set of opponents."—Ath., No. 2861.

Contemporary Social Agitation in England, Lon., 1884, p. 8vo.

"The present instalment of Mr. Mallock's defence of the propertied classes consists of a reprint of three polemical articles from the 'Quarterly Review.' . . . Mr. Mallock discusses the question entirely from the position of an advocate, not from that of a judge. He is only concerned to traverse all the contentions of his opponents, whether right or wrong, and conveniently ignores any little flaws in his own case."—Ath., No. 2953.

Mansel, Very Rev. Henry Longueville, D.D., [ante, vol. ii., add.,] 1820–1871, educated at Merchant Taylors' School, and at St. John's College, Oxford, where he graduated 1843, and was elected a Fellow; ordained 1843; appointed reader in moral and metaphysical philosophy at Magdalen College 1855; Waynflete professor 1859; Regius professor of ecclesiastical history and canon of Christ Church 1866; dean of St. Paul's, in succession to Dr. Milman, 1868. 1. Scenes from an Unfinished Drama entitled Phrontisterion, or, Oxford in the Nineteenth Century; 3d ed., Oxf., 1852, 8vo. Anon. 2. The Limits of Religious Thought, (Bampton Lectures,) Lon., 1858, 8vo; 5th ed., 1867, p. 8vo.

"Whatever Mr. Mansel undertakes bears the marks of his great ability and industry, and these lectures rise to a grave eloquence of which his other writings, from their subjects, would hardly admit. The language is well chosen and fits close to the thought, and a subject is fairly pursued without digression or needless ornament. . . . But the net result of this work, in the way of influence on religious opinion, will hardly be all that the author would desire, either in kind or in amount. The key to all religious difficulties Mr. Mansel places in a distinction between speculative and regulative truths. We may have a knowledge of a religious principle sufficient for practical guidance, which, however, does not amount to a real insight into the subject-matter; nay, more, if we attempt to find the grounds on which our practical principle rests, we shall be entangled not merely in difficulties but in positive contradictions. . . . Mr. Mansel, borrowing from Kant even the very terms of his distinction between speculative and regulative truth, breaks down the one fulcrum [the authority of the moral ideas and convictions] which Kant kept for his lever. His theory of the unattainableness of truth is thorough-going. His originality consists in his application of such a principle to the defence of Anglican belief."—Sat. Rev., vi. 404.

"To Oxford men, who know how close were the relations between the late Dean Mansel and his favourite pupil and successor in the Waynflete chair of metaphysics, Mr. Chandler, of Pembroke, the present volume will have a peculiar and especial interest. It contains, we gather from the Preface, 'the minor philosophical works of the late Dean Mansel, nearly all his reviews, together with two articles hitherto unpublished,—viz., the lecture on Utility as the Ground of Moral Obligation, and the fragment on Berkeley's Philosophy, the completion of which was prevented by the decease of the author.'"—Ath., No. 2371.

9. The Gnostic Heresies of the First and Second Centuries. Edited by J. B. Lightfoot. Lon., 1875, 8vo. (Contains a prefatory notice of the author by Lord Carnarvon.)

"It is the peculiar interest of Gnosticism that it commemorates the speculations of those questioning spirits who confronted a world of evil and misery, and a God descended for its redemption, under the light both of a fading mythology and a dawning philosophy. The worshipper of Mithra and the believer in Evolution both find their kindred here. A web of thought that thus gathers up into one unity the future and the past repays earnest and unprejudiced study. And if we cannot say of the volume before us that it conveys as fully as we should desire the results of such study, yet in its wide range of learning and lucid power of representation it forms, at least, a valuable introduction to this memorial of a phase of spiritual life that no one can learn to know without becoming better qualified to understand the early ages of Christianity, and hence, we believe, understanding better the meaning of Christianity for all time."—Spectator, xlix. 180.

Markham, Capt. Albert Hastings, R.N., brother of C. B. Markham, infra. 1. The Cruise of the "Rosario" amongst the New Hebrides and Santa Cruz Islands, Lon., 1873, 8vo.

"His orders were to visit every island in the New Hebrides and Santa Cruz groups, to investigate numerous murders of British subjects which had recently been committed by the islanders, and to report upon the alleged cases of kidnapping which were supposed to have led to these crimes."—Ath., No. 2378.

2. A Whaling Cruise to Baffin's Bay, Lon., 1874, 8vo; 2d ed., 1875, p. 8vo. 3. The Great Frozen Sea: a Personal Narrative of the Voyage of the "Alert" during the Arctic Expedition of 1875–76, Lon., 1878, 8vo; 6th ed., 1884.

"It is both trustworthy and readable. It only professes to be a relation of the writer's own experiences, but, in reality, so intimately was its author mixed up with the affairs of the different sledge-parties that it may be safely taken as an outline account of the proceedings of all concerned."—Ath., No. 2644.

4. Northward Ho! including a Narrative of Captain Phipps' Expedition. By a Midshipman. Lon., 1879, p. 8vo. 5. (Ed.) The Voyages and Works of Captain John Davis, (Hakluyt Soc. Pub.,) Lon., 1880, 8vo. 6. A Polar Reconnaissance: being the Voyage of the "Isbjörn" to Novaya Zemlya in 1879. Illust. Lon., 1881, 8vo.

"He now gives us an account of his cruise in the liveliest of little cutters, the 'Isbjörn,' which was hired by Sir Henry George Booth . . . for a sporting trip to Novaya Zemlya. . . . Capt. Markham is a keen observer of nature, and the results of his observation are charmingly told."—Acad., xix. 236.

Markham, Christopher A. History of the County Buildings of Northamptonshire. Illust. Northampton, 1885, 8vo.

Markham, Clements Robert, C.B., F.R.S., F.S.A., [ante, vol. ii., add.,] b. 1830, at Stillingfleet, Yorkshire; served as midshipman in the Arctic expedition in search of Sir J. Franklin 1850–51; made a journey of exploration in Peru 1852–54; was employed in introducing the cultivation of the cinchona-tree into India 1860–61, and was geographer to the Abyssinian expedition 1867–68; secretary of the Hakluyt Society 1858, and of the Royal Geographical Society 1863; assistant secretary in the India Office 1868–77; editor of the Geographical Magazine 1872–78. 1. Travels in Peru and India while superintending the Collection of Cinchona Plants and Seeds in South America and their Introduction into India, Lon., 1862, 8vo.

"His work will be read with interest and profit, from the variety of subjects on which it supplies reliable information, and the manner in which they are treated."—Ath., No. 1829.

2. Contributions towards a Grammar and Dictionary of the Quichua, the Language of the Yncas of Peru, Lon., 1863, p. 8vo. 3. Spanish Irrigation, 1867. 4. A History of the Abyssinian Expedition, Lon., 1869, 8vo. 5. A Life of the Great Lord Fairfax, Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the Parliament of England, Lon., 1870, 8vo.

"A book of real and conscientious work. . . . Mr. Markham's chief object seems to be to challenge for Fairfax his proper place in the military history of the Civil War, in which he holds that his fame has been unfairly overshadowed by the fame of Cromwell."—Sat. Rev., xxx. 22.

6. Ollanta: a Drama in the Quichua Language: Text, Translation, and Introduction, Lon., 1871, p. 8vo. 7. A Memoir on the Indian Surveys: printed by Order of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India in Council, Lon., 1871, imp. 8vo; 2d ed., 1878.

"For a full, precise, and faithful record of what science has done and is doing for our great Eastern dependency, we cannot do better than refer the reader to Mr. Markham's admirable Memoir."—Sat. Rev., xxxi. 806.

8. The Threshold of the Unknown Region. Maps. Lon., 1873, p. 8vo; new ed., 1876.

"The object of the book, as stated in the author's dedication to Sir George Back, is 'to give to the public a correct knowledge of the whole line of frontier separating the known from the unknown region round the North Pole, to recall the stories of early voyagers, to narrate the recent efforts of gallant adventurers of various nationalities to cross the threshold, to set forth the arguments in favour of a renewal of Arctic exploration by England, and to enumerate in detail the valuable and important results to be derived from North Polar discovery'"—Ath., No. 2398.

"The author, besides being qualified for his task by personal experience, states his facts lucidly, and has made a very readable book."—Sat. Rev., xxxvi. 475.

9. General Sketch of the History of Persia, Lon., 1874, 8vo. 10. A Memoir of the Lady Ana de Osorio, Countess of Chinchon and Vice-Queen of Peru, A.D. 1629–39: with a Plea for the Correct Spelling of the Chinchona Genus. Illust. Lon., 1875, sm. 4to.

"This dainty little volume contains the result of as much erudition and labour, although it be of love, as many a pretentious work of large proportions. . . . It has interest of no mean order for the historian, biographer, heraldist, and botanist."—Ath., No. 2465.

11. Arctic Navy List: Arctic and Antarctic Officers, 1773–1873, Lon., 1875, 8vo. 12. J. G. Goodenough: a Brief Memoir, Lon., 1876, 12mo. 13. (Ed.) Life of Robert Fairfax, of Steeton, Vice-Admiral, Alderman, and Member for York, A.D. 1666–1725: compiled from Original Letters and other Documents, Lon., 1885, 8vo.

"Mr. Markham has not been wanting in industry. He has hunted up his facts, and is scrupulously careful in giving pedigrees. . . . From the literary point of view, however, his book is less satisfactory. . . . His facts follow one another like geese on a common."—Sat. Rev., lx. 324.

19. The Fighting Veres: an Historical Biography of Sir Francis Vere and Lord Vere, his Brother, Leading Generals in the Netherlands when England was aiding the Dutch, Lon., 1888, 8vo.

"It is a merit in Mr. Markham's book that he makes us see the men in action, and also that he brings a trained eye to the description of topography, of districts, cities, and fortifications, the stages on which they played their manful parts."—Spectator, lxi. 452.

Mr. Markham has edited the following works for the Hakluyt Society: 1. The Life and Acts of Don A. Enriquez de Guzman, A.D. 1518 to 1543, Lon., 1862, 8vo. 2. Mr. Marsh throughout keeps himself up to the newest lights. . . . On the whole, Mr. Marsh is stronger in the literary than in the purely philological part of his lectures." —Sat. Rev., xiv. 482.

3. Man and Nature; or, Physical Geography as modified by Human Action, N. York and Lon., 1864, 8vo; new ed., entitled "The Earth as modified by Human Action," 1870. (An Italian edition was issued at Florence in 1870, with numerous changes and additions. The second American edition embodies still further changes.)

"The great merits of 'Man and Nature' have long since made it an American classic as well as given it an international reputation. It is, in our opinion, one of the most useful and suggestive works ever published. . . . The least observant and reflecting will find entertainment in reading him, and all may profit by his teachings."—Nation, xix. 223.

Marsh, Hippesley Cunliffe, F.R.G.S., captain 18th Bengal Cavalry. A Ride through Islam: being a Journey through Persia and Afghanistan to India viâ Meshed, Herat, and Kandahar, Lon., 1877, 8vo.

"The experience acquired through several years' service in India enabled the author to get out of Persians and Afghans as much information, aid, and countenance as in the nature of things was possible."—Sat. Rev., xliv. 488.

"There are two points of real interest in Captain Marsh's book: the first is the picture he draws of the condition of Persia, and the position and prospects of its people; the second is his description of his sojourn at Herat, and the insight which he gained during it into Afghan life and politics."—Spectator, l. 1211.

Annals of Chepstow Castle, from the Conquest to the Revolution. Edited by Sir John Maclean. Exeter, 1883. Posth.

"The work is of more than local interest, for the Lords of Strigul were from the first men of note, who made a conspicuous figure in the history of their times. Great research is displayed in compiling their lives. . . . but it savours of the Dryasdust type of antiquary that 'The Annals of Chepstow Castle' contain no description of the castle."—EDMUND CHESTER WATERS: Acad., xxiv. 325.

In 1883 he was appointed lecturer on political economy at Balliol College, Oxford, and in 1884 he succeeded Professor Fawcett as professor of political economy at Cambridge University. The Present Position of Economics: an Inaugural Lecture, Lon., 1885, p. 8vo. With MARSHALL, MARY PALEY, The Economics of Industry, Lon., 1879, 12mo.

"Mr. Marshall has been known for several years . . . as one of the most accomplished and learned economists in England, and Mrs. Marshall bore a high reputation as lecturer at Newnham Hall, Cambridge."—Acad., xvi. 329.

"As a systematic treatise on that part of political economy with which it deals, it is no exaggeration to say that, in our judgment, it renders almost obsolete all the current English books. It summarizes, in a compendious form, the results of all the latest economic inquiry and speculation on the subjects of Production, Distribution, and Value, and presents the whole with much originality of argument and freshness of illustration."—Spectator, lii. 1512.

"He has produced a book which, though it is long, contains a greater number of figures, in proportion to its length, than any other book we ever remember to have seen, except a cash-book. . . . Mr. Marshall has been nowhere off the beaten track, has seen nothing which others have not seen before him, and does not seem capable of seeing anything that is not pointed out in a guide-book."—*Sat. "Mr. Marshall's book is almost enough to sap the patriotic constancy of that renowned person who, in spite of all temptations to belong to other nations, remained an Englishman. . . . The cumulative effect upon the imagination of its inexhaustible statistics and details could not easily be exaggerated. . . . We have an idea that if any one (with adequate raw material at command) were desirous of manufacturing a continent in all respects a fac-simile of the United States, he would find every instruction necessary to his purpose in Mr. Marshall's volume."—Spectator, liv. 1312.

"Darkness around him, darkness below and above, is the element within which this poet moves. He would fain find a meaning in the reiterated rigours of Fate, but he knows not whether he may discern it or not. . . . The book is an eminently sincere one, and as high-minded as it is sincere. . . . The feeling is not only deep, it is strenuous and high-strung; and the author evinces his poetic vocation by co-ordinating emotion with thought."—W. M. Rossetti: Acad., vii. 311.

"The work of a lady who is a grand-daughter of Dr. Aikin and a great-niece of Mrs. Barbauld. Her mother was daughter of Gilbert Wakefield. . . . Her daughter, the present editor, is careful to disclaim any deliberate literary effort The result is, however, an interesting series of rather miscellaneous recollections, which, if not remarkable as literature, possess something of the attraction of such books as Crabb Robinson's Diary. Very pleasant glimpses we obtain of the apostles of dissent in an age of political ferment, . . . of Scott, Lamb, Coleridge, and a host of others."—Acad., xxiv. 292.

13. The Life of His Royal Highness the Prince Consort, Lon., 1874–79, 5 vols. 8vo. (This was undertaken at the request of the queen.)

"Of the industry, the literary skill, and the good taste with which he has written the 'Life of the Prince Consort,' there is, except among a few party politicians, little difference of opinion. Throughout the work, courtly reticence has been reconciled with independent judgment, and sincere appreciation has never expressed itself in the language of flattery."—Sat. Rev., xlix. 445.

"Take it for what it is, and what it was pretty sure to be if the author were to continue from the commencement to the close, as it was not undesirable for many purposes that he should, in confidential communication and full sympathy with the Queen, the 'Life' is well done. . . . Very few men who could have adapted themselves at all to Sir Theodore Martin's conditions could have written the book so well as Sir Theodore Martin has written it."—Spectator, liii. 401.

"Few readers will begin the first volume without being carried to the end of the second, if only by reason of the clear and straightforward, if not picturesque, style."—Sat. Rev., xliii. 328.

"On the whole, this Autobiography, though containing some passages which must excite regret, is one of the most remarkable books which we have seen for a long time. Its speculative features give it a peculiar value apart from the mere biography, but even as regards that, it may rank with the lives of Ticknor or [sic] Macaulay."—Ath., No. 2577.

"They are the memorials of a woman of great strength, and of a life of redundant energy and high public spirit, though not one at all deficient in harsh and repellent elements of character. One thing in connection with this book we heartily regret: . . . we mean the volume of memorials by Mrs. Chapman, to whom Miss Martineau confided her autobiography. This volume exaggerates painfully everything that is disagreeable in the autobiography itself."—Spectator, l. 311.

"So far as deliberate intention goes, this is doubtless one of the very honestest biographies ever written; and in respect to careful self-analysis, it probably stands at the head of its whole class. . . . All her personal judgments are vitiated by the same sweeping positiveness, the same rhetorical inaccuracy."—Nation, xxiv. 223, 236.

BENN: Acad., xxxiii. 179.

"On the whole, we shall have to say that the old presumptions for Providence, Free-Will, Immortality, are here restated in a careful post-Darwinian form, but that little of fresh argument is really added; and that this book (like every book of the kind which has ever preceded it) fails in its attempt to raise these mainly subjective presumptions to the level of objective and demonstrated truth."—Ath., No. 3144.

Marvin, Charles, 1854–1890, b. at Plumstead, Kent; educated partly in Russia, where he spent five years, 1870–75; was afterwards a copyist in the inland revenue and other departments, including the Foreign Office, and, having furnished the London Globe with the text of an agreement between the English and Russian governments, 1878, was prosecuted, but discharged by the magistrate for lack of evidence. In 1882 he was sent to Russia by Joseph Cowen, M.P., proprietor of the Newcastle Chronicle, to ascertain the views of leading statesmen and generals in regard to supposed designs against India. He again visited Russia as a correspondent of the Morning Post in 1883, and in 1888 to investigate the petroleum industry at Baku. He lectured in different towns of Great Britain and contributed numerous articles to periodicals. 1. Our Public Offices: embodying an Account of the Disclosure of the Anglo-Russian Agreement and the Unrevealed Secret Treaty of May 31st, 1878, Lon., 1879, cr. 8vo; 5th ed., 1883. 2. The Eye-Witnesses' Account of the Disastrous Russian Campaign against the Akhal Tekké Turcomans. Maps and Plans. Lon., 1880, 8vo.

"As the narrative is compiled chiefly from the letters of eye-witnesses published in Russian newspapers, it is not exposed to an accusation of Russophobia, and may fairly be accepted as trustworthy, at all events as regards facts."—Ath., No. 2748.

3. Colonel Grodekoff's Ride from Samarcand to Herat, through Balkh and the Uzbek States of Afghan Turkestan: with his Own Map of the March-Route from the Oxus to Herat. Maps and Plans. Lon., 1880, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1885.

"Chiefly valuable to the geographer, the statesman, and the soldier, it is, nevertheless, from the insight which it gives into Afghan life and manners, well worthy of perusal by the general reader."—Ath., No. 2758.

4. Merv, the Queen of the World and the Scourge of the Man-Stealing Turcomans: with an Exposition of the Khorassan Question, Lon., 1881, 8vo.

"He has sought to supply facts rather than his own opinions, and, putting together what various travellers have written, he has in most cases given their own words. One noteworthy feature of the work is that it contains a large amount of information derived from Russian sources."—Ath., No. 2786.

5. The Russian Advance towards India: Conversations with Skobeleff, Ignatieff, and other Distinguished Russian Generals and Statesmen on the Central Asian Question, Lon., 1882, cr. 8vo.

"A book in which is recorded a series of recent conversations with several of the most distinguished Russian generals and statesmen on the Central Asian question. . . . The author's comments thereon are pertinent and occasionally suggestive."—Ath., No. 2855.

8. Reconnoitring in Central Asia: Pioneering Adventures in the Region lying between Russia and India. Map and Illust. Lon., 1884, 8vo; 2d ed., 1885.

"It is not to be expected that all Mr. Marvin's readers will be persuaded by his arguments to look at this Central Asian question from his point; but though they may differ in opinion, they will readily admit the obligation he has conferred upon them by placing within their reach a mass of substantial information derived from Russian or 'confidential' reports which have hitherto been sealed books to them."—Ath., No. 2965.

9. The Russians at the Gate of Herat. Illust. and Map. Lon., 1885, p. 8vo and 12mo. (34,000 copies sold.) "The book before us, a volume of English poems by a young Frenchman, glows with this old familiar fire, [of the Renaissance.] Reading these strange and powerful verses, full of the healthy delight in life and sunshine that seemed to have passed away with the Troubadours, we have to remind ourselves that their author lives amongst us, and did not walk the earth with his elder countrymen, the Albigenses and the Provençals. . . . He has produced a book that is unique of its kind and illuminated with undeniable genius."—Spectator, xlvi. 1248.

Masson, David, LL.D., [ante, vol. ii., add.,] became editor of Macmillan's Magazine in 1859, and in 1865 resigned the chair of English language and literature at University College, London, to become professor of rhetoric and English literature in the University of Edinburgh. Since 1879 he has acted as editor of the Registry of the Privy Council of Scotland. 1. The Life of John Milton: narrated in Connection with the Political, Ecclesiastical, and Literary History of his Time, Lon., 1858–79, 6 vols. 8vo.

"Although Mr. Masson may not be an elegant historian, he is what is of infinitely greater importance,—a singularly accurate and therefore an altogether trustworthy one. . . . This 'Life of Milton' is a book which the present generation will hand down with pride to its successors."—Sat. Rev., xlix. 380.

"He has inseparably associated his name with that of Milton, and all students of the poet and of his age will be compelled to consult these volumes. It would be difficult to estimate the labour expended by the author. Not only has he mastered all the authorities which bear directly on his subject, but with infinite skill and perseverance he seems to have followed every track, however obscure, which could lead to any point of interest remotely associated with his great hero. Thoroughness and impartiality are the qualities of highest value, perhaps, in this 'Life of Milton.' Mr. Masson is eminently trustworthy. He takes nothing at second-hand; every step of his ground has been won by hard fighting, and perhaps there is no living writer who has a larger acquaintance with the politics and literature of the seventeenth century. The faults of this magnum opus are as obvious as its merits. The author is a chronicler rather than an historian. In his anxiety to tell all he knows, and he appears to know everything, he does not always see the difference between what is of primary importance and what is of secondary value. . . . We know much more about Milton, thanks to Mr. Masson, but we do not see him more clearly, and the central figure is, as it were, hidden under the heap of stones which the biographer's reverence has led him to cast upon his cairn."—Spectator, liii. 910.

"To this biography . . . is imparted, by the author's intense devotion to his subject and to the responsibilities of literature, an elevation and strength, both in style and substance, which can suffer no abatement from an occasional failure in the proportions of the design or in the writer's judicial instinct Mr. Masson's publication is a work of national importance."—Ath., No. 2732.

Recent British Philosophy: a Review, with Criticisms: including some Comments on Mr. Mill's Answer to Sir William Hamilton, Lon., 1865, cr. 8vo; 3d ed., with additional chapter, 1877.

"The volume, for its bulk and scope, forms as serviceable a manual as could be desired for the understanding of the progress made by philosophy, properly so called, in Great Britain during the last thirty years. . . . His account of the several authors and systems embraced in his work is clear and graphic, almost picturesque. But these charms of style are counterbalanced by the want of that faculty of discrimination which is required for assigning to each of these the proper weight in the scale, and for keeping essentially distinct ideas steadily asunder."—*Sat. "It is impossible to do anything like justice to his extensive knowledge, his unwearied patience, his carefulness in stating facts, the skill with which he applies, and in all cases fairly applies, the labours of earlier editors, and, above all, to the hearty admiration and enthusiasm which have sustained him through his long and difficult toil. . . . "It is certainly odd to find at starting that in such a scheme such a writer as Alfred de Musset should be 'passed with but casual attention;' but when this allowance has been made,—and it must be admitted to be a considerable one,—the volume will be found to contain a good deal of information which will be useful to those who approach the subject as a new one, and a good deal of critical writing which perhaps may not lose in interest from the fact that one often finds oneself unable to accept the author's views."—*Sat. He has contributed to periodicals. 1. On the Method of the Study of Mind, Lon., 1865, 8vo. 2. The Physiology and Pathology of Mind, Lon., 1867, 8vo; 2d ed., 1868.

"A manual of mental science in all its parts, embracing all that is known in the existing state of physiology. . . . "The fundamental article, or ground-plan, upon which the whole of his system is built up, is the admitted physiological fact that with every display of mental activity there is a correlative change or waste of nervous element, and that on the condition of the material substratum must depend the degree and character of the manifested energy or the mental phenomenon."—Spectator, xlix. 1377.

"Dr. Maudsley has had opportunities inferior to none of observing the aberrations of the mental portion of our nature from its normal and healthy state, and he has brought to its study an amount of patience, honesty of purpose, and acute analysis seldom equalled, with a power of scholarly and clear expression in which medical books are too often deficient."—Spectator, lii. 1481.

He thinks that 'the complete accomplishment of disillusion,' for which he himself labours so strenuously, may very likely be 'the close of development and the beginning of degeneration.' . . . His is a strange attitude of mind."—Spectator, lix. 1448.

"He has furnished a valuable epitome, not only of the stirring incidents of 1848 and 1849, but also of the social and political conditions of the generation leading up to them. The facts . . . are, however, so crowded together that the ordinary reader will derive from his narrative a less clear understanding of the subject than might have been obtained either from a work of the same size with fewer details, or from a work large enough for its contents to be set forth picturesquely and in perspective."—Ath., No. 3132.

"A biography which will most impress those who study it most faithfully, first, by the almost mediæval character of its theological motive; next, by the singular judgment and skill displayed in its composition; and, lastly, by the depth of sympathy with which an able and scientific soldier has brought out for us characteristics which we should have thought but little likely to have taken possession, as they must have taken possession, of his intellect, as well as of his heart."—Spectator, lvii. 347.

Maurice, Rev. John Frederick Denison, D.D., [ante, vol. ii., MAURICE, FREDERICK DENISON, add.,] 1805–1872. He was presented in 1860 to the living of St. Peter's, Vere Street, London, which he held till 1869. He took an active part in founding the Working-Men's College in London in 1854, and also in establishing Queen's College for Women. In 1866 he was elected Knightsbridge professor of moral philosophy at Cambridge. The position of Mr. Maurice in the English Church was peculiar and in some respects unique. While his views in regard to the doctrine of eternal punishment and other questions drew upon him the condemnation of the general mass of the clergy, he was an object of almost unbounded reverence with a small body of followers, for whom the value of his intellectual and spiritual teachings was enhanced by the simplicity and saintliness of his life. His permanent influence is to be traced, if at all, in the growth of liberal sentiments in regard to differences of opinion within the pale of the church. For biog., see MAURICE, COL. J. The author stimulates and quickens thought, so that the reader is carried along, pleased, instructed, and elevated. . . . Analyses of mental phenomena, the resolution of complex states of mind, the subtle perception of motives and what determines them, need not be expected. "If Mr. Maurice had called this book 'Lectures on the Philosophy of History in Relation to Social Morals,' it would, we conceive, have been nearer the mark than 'Social Morality.' It is a book rich in thought and insight."—Spectator, xliii. 203.

"Mr. Maurice's general conclusions are that all education, whether religious or secular, may be given in a thoroughly Christian spirit or in a thoroughly unchristian spirit, and that there is quite as good a chance of the religious education being given in a thoroughly unchristian spirit as of the secular."—Spectator, xliv. 105.

19. The Friendship of Books, and other Lectures. Edited, with a Preface, by T. Hughes, M.P. Lon., 1873, p. 8vo.

"Something may be seen of what manner of man Mr. Maurice was in his daily intercourse in these lectures,—on Books, Newspapers, Words, History, Civilization, Spenser, Milton, Burke, on the Acquisition of Knowledge, and on Criticism,—which are taken as samples, almost at hazard, from a vast number which he delivered in all parts of the country to all kinds of audiences."—Spectator, xlvi. 81.

"As we read Mr. Hughes's pugnacious preface to the wise and kindly lectures which follow, we seem to be listening to a converted prize-fighter introducing a Christian missionary. . . . There is . . . very little obscurity in these lectures, though there are some touches of the author's peculiar mysticism. They deal for the most part with popular subjects: with the uses of books and newspapers; with the right methods of studying history; with Milton, Spenser, and Burke, and with modern criticism. They are full of really profound sayings, and are animated throughout by a kindliness which always endeavours to look at the best side of men and things, and to recognize the soul of good in things evil."—Sat. Rev., xxxvi. 758.

20. Sermons preached in Country Churches, Lon., 1873, cr. 8vo; 2d ed., 1880.

"There are many of us . . . who, having heard these sermons, or others like them, preached by him in country villages, remember how the dullest peasant and the least susceptible to humanizing influences has brightened up on that Sunday, and shown as he came out of church that he had been hearing one speak 'as never man spake' to him before."—Spectator, xlvi. 1013.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"As an author he was always singularly suggestive, and beautiful passages, 'fruitful of further thought and deed,' are abundant. But he is constantly obscure, and in his earnest endeavour to counteract erroneous views he has often destroyed the literary completeness of his work by blending temporary matters with more permanent objects. As a matter of fact, his chief influence was strictly personal."—Ath., No. 2941.

"Great as his genius and intellect were, and much of permanent fruit as they have borne, inestimable as have been his services in instructing and guiding and comforting erring and suffering men and women by his wise and sympathizing counsels, yet above all these good works we set this, that he was in very truth—and that those who saw and heard him knew that he was—a messenger sent from God, to bear witness of the relation of God to us."—Spectator, xxvi. 1014.

In 1856 he became professor of natural philosophy in Marischal College, Aberdeen, and in 1861 was elected professor of natural philosophy in King's College, London, a position which he resigned on the death of his father, to reside on his estate in Scotland. In 1871 he was appointed to the newly-founded professorship of experimental physics at Cambridge University, including the directorship of the Cavendish Laboratory. He contributed many valuable papers to scientific periodicals, and published fugitive verses and epigrams in various magazines. For biog., see Campbell, Lewis, supra. 1. The analysis is throughout immediately connected with experimental results; and the whole subject is exhibited in a way which must delight those who have hitherto been compelled to cull their knowledge of it from many and detached sources, where the notation and the methods of considering the subject have been in general not such as to present to the inquirer anything in the nature of a homogeneous whole."—Ath., No. 2400.

Maxwell, Mary Elizabeth, (Braddon,) b. 1837, in London; the daughter of a solicitor. She began to write at a very early age, contributing verses, political squibs, and parodies to provincial newspapers. She is also the author of several plays, which have been acted, among them the Loves of Arcadia, a commedietta, in 1860, and Married Beneath Him, in 1882; but her chief success has been won by her novels, which have had a very large circulation, some of the early ones especially having passed through many editions. She was married in 1874 to John Maxwell, a publisher, in London. She is the editor of the Mistletoe Bough, a Christmas annual, each number containing a complete story, generally written by herself. 1. Garibaldi, and other Poems, Lon., 1861, fp. 8vo. 2. The Lady Lisle, Lon., 1861, fp. 8vo. 3. Ralph the Bailiff, and other Tales, Lon., 1862, 12mo; new ed., 1869. 4. The Captain of the "Vulture," Lon., 1862, 12mo; new ed., 1867. 5. "It is, in fact, just the sort of book to be read by everybody,—not too sentimental for a man's requirements, nor too useful for a woman's; having no end of plots and conspiracies for those who like plots, and plenty of light, agreeable conversation for those who do not. The descriptions of scenery are excellent, and discrimination is displayed

8. John Marchmont's Legacy, Lon., 1863, 3 vols. p. 8vo; 4th ed., 1864.

"It is absurd to think that a lady even so clever and fertile as the authoress of 'Lady Audley's Secret' can fly like a bee from novel to novel and always make honey of the first quality. 'John Marchmont's Legacy' is not so good as 'Eleanor's Victory.'"—Sat. Rev, xvi. 816.

"Let us accept the fact that her novels are immensely popular. . . . Let us admit, what no one would care to deny, that there is a vast amount of cleverness in her writing,—'cleverness' is the exact word. Why is it that to read one of her novels in earnest is most distinctly to waste time which could be better spent? Why is it that we feel, after dawdling through one of her many romances, a little ashamed of ourselves? The reasons are not far to seek. Miss Braddon's first and great fault is not atoned for by all that cleverness and facile ability of which she has so much. It is that there is in her no real thought, no analysis that is worth the name, no insight into human nature."—Ath., No. 2294.

"It would be in the highest degree unjust to regard the wealth of historical and artistic detail offered by these volumes as their chief title to commendation, or even to treat the book as the elaborate monograph of an accomplished dilettante. . . . Only an historian of a high order could deal with such a theme, as Sir William Stirling-Maxwell has dealt with it, competently and in many respects exhaustively."—Sat. Rev, lvii. 647.

"The value of this biography of Don John of Austria lies in the side-lights which it throws on many subjects. It is full of the results of the curiosity of a cultivated mind working leisurely at a subject of its own choice. The mere fact that Sir William Stirling-Maxwell collected all the prints, medals, and books relating to the period of Don John's life gives his pages vividness. . . . The erudition of the book does not hang clumsily round the writer. He has thoroughly caught the spirit of the times, and presents a finished picture of many of its aspects."—M. "If Mr. Erskine May's book has not the interest of a general history, as a constitutional history it is very valuable, . . . and, so far as a book on so dry a subject can be, readable in all its departments."—Sat. Rev., xv. 438.

2. Democracy in Europe: a History, Lon., 1877, 2 vols. 8vo.

"He has worked carefully and conscientiously; but there is none of that life that comes from genuine independent research, no sign of that mastery of the subject which can be got by living in it. There is no hearty entering into the spirit of distant times and countries. . . . Yet many parts of the book may form useful constitutional summaries for those who may not care to go very deep into matters."—Sat. Rev., xlv. 17, 57.

"He would have described the contents of his book much better had he called it 'Democracies in Europe: Studies in History.' It is not an account of the rise and development of democratic schemes and institutions in Europe. . . . After a preliminary disquisition on Democracy, he reviews the histories of different countries during those periods when that form of government was in vogue. He interrupts his narratives occasionally to indulge in a parallel or a comparison between those facts he has just recorded and those which he has recorded a little before, but he scarcely attempts to give a succinct view of any one of the causes which at various times sent forth waves of democracy over large parts of the surface of Europe. . . . If his book is not subtle, it is always interesting. There may be little fire in it, but there is, at all events, plenty of light."—Spectator, li. 57, 87.

Melville, George Wallace, b. 1841, in New York City; entered the U.S. navy in 1861 as assistant engineer, and became chief engineer, with the rank of lieutenant-commander, in 1881. He was engineer of the Jeannette, which sailed on an Arctic expedition in July, 1879, under Lieutenant George W. De Long, supra. After the loss of the Jeannette and the subsequent journey across the ice to Bennett's Island, Engineer Melville commanded one of the boats in which the party embarked for the Lena, and reached one of the mouths of the river September 17, 1881. He made an unsuccessful search for De Long and his party, which he renewed in the following spring, and about the end of March discovered their remains and brought them to the United States. In 1887 he was appointed chief of the bureau of steam-engineers, with the rank of commodore, and engineer-in-chief of the U.S. navy. In the Lena Delta: a Narrative of the Search for Lieut.-Commander De Long and his Companions, followed by an Account of the Greely Relief Expedition and a Proposed Method of reaching the North Pole. Edited by Melville Philips. Maps and Illust. Bost., 1885, 8vo.

"A prominent characteristic of the work is the straightforward earnestness of the narrative; devoid alike of literary style and of those pretensions to it which so often repel the reader in works of travel. The personality of the author is unconsciously revealed to us in his pages, and in a manner which commands our respect and admiration." —Nation, xl. 60.

Meredith, George, [ante, vol. ii., add.,] b. 1828, in Hampshire, Eng.; educated in Germany; studied law, but gave up that profession for literature. His works have been very slow in winning public appreciation. The circulation of his earlier books was very limited, and it was not until after the publication of Diana of the Crossways, in 1885, that a demand for them arose, leading to the publication of a collective edition. The following list includes three which are mentioned ante, vol. ii. 1. Poems, Lon., 1851, 12mo. 2. The Shaving of Shagpat: an Arabian Entertainment, [a burlesque poem,] Lon., 1855, cr. 8vo. 3. Farina: a Legend of Cologne, [verse,] Lon., 1857, cr. 8vo. 4. The Ordeal of Richard Feverel, Lon., 1859, 3 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1878, 1 vol.

"This 'Ordeal' is about as painful a book as any reader ever felt himself inexorably compelled to read through in spite of his own protests to the contrary,—for read it, and read it through, he must, if he once begins it, for the sole purpose of knowing what comes of it all. The book is very clever, with a fresh, vigorous vitality in the style; but it is not true to real life or human nature; only true to an abstract and entirely arbitrary idea."—Ath., No. 1654.

5. Evan Harrington, Lon., 1861, 3 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1868. 6. Modern Love, and Poems of the English Roadside: with Poems and Ballads, Lon., 1862, 12mo.

"'Modern Love' contains passages of true beauty and feeling; but they are like the casual glimpses of a fair landscape in some noxious clime, where the mists only break to gather again more densely."—Ath., No. 1805.

7. Mary Bertrand, Lon., 1862. 8. Emilia in England, Lon., 1864, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 9. Rhoda Fleming: a Story, Lon., 1865, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 10. Vittoria, Lon., 1866, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"There can be no mistake either as to his abilities, or as to his failure in obtaining a corresponding place in popular esteem. In 'Vittoria' . . . he has shown as much power of thought and style as would fit out a dozen writers of sensation novels. There is scarcely a page in which there is not evidence of originality, and, what is much rarer, of conscientious labour, often skilfully applied. The conversations . . . are only too pointed and vigorous for the interlocutors. Almost every character stands out distinctly and forcibly; some show great originality of conception. . . . Yet, with all these merits, and we might conscientiously speak of others, we fear that Mr. Meredith's novel has the unmistakable fault of being hard to read. It is often so clever as to be on the verge of genius, but somehow we don't get on with it. It is a succession of brilliancies which are never fused in a brilliant whole." —Sat. Rev., xxiii. 149.

11. The Adventures of Harry Richmond, Lon., 1871, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"It is quite worth reading; but it is itself a sketch in three volumes, in spite of the extraordinary minuteness of description."—Ath., No. 2297.

12. Beauchamp's Career, Lon., 1875, 3 vols. p. 8vo. (First published as a serial in the Fortnightly Review.)

"In 'Beauchamp's Career' Mr. Meredith has ventured upon a bold experiment. He has striven to combine the study of individual character with the expression and discussion of modern ideas, and, in place of the precise portraiture of contemporary manners which serves the ordinary novelist by way of background, he has here given us a complex net-work of social and political problems in which the chief figures of the story are caught and entangled. Indeed, all the characters, from the highest to the lowest, are made in their different degrees to feel the intellectual pressure of their time. . . . The peculiar characteristics of Mr. Meredith's style perfectly accord with the conditions of the chosen scheme of art. Like the invention of a Japanese artist, his mode of workmanship reflects the singularity as well as the beauty of actual nature."—Sat. Rev., xli. 626.

13. The Egoist: a Comedy in Narrative, Lon., 1879, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"Perhaps the most solid work, even to the verge of toughness, which Mr. Meredith has ever produced. . . . It is purely a study of character; incidents count for very little in it. . . . Those who persevere to the end will find their reward in it."—Sat. Rev., xlviii. 607.

"After closing the book, we feel in the retrospect that the style is the most memorable thing about it. It is like a wayward wind blowing against the current of the story, and raising little humorous waves and eddies which both look pretty and prevent our getting a clear view of what lies underneath."—Spectator, lii. 1383.

14. The Tragic Comedians: a Study on a Well-Known Story, Lon., 1880, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The well-known story is that of the tragic fate of Ferdinand Lasalle, the Messiah, as he is called, of Social Democracy. . . . Mr. Meredith's study of the well-known subject does not appear to have been particularly profound, and he has been content to follow, step by step, the story of Lasalle's death as told by the lady who caused it . . .

If we had not read Frau von Racowitza's book we might have placed 'The Tragic Comedians' very high among the brilliant productions with which Mr. Meredith has enriched English fiction. And certainly readers who are ignorant of the original will do well to read Mr. Meredith's adaptation, which is as stimulating in style, and at least as lucid in arrangement, as anything else he has given to the world."—Ath., No. 2776.

15. Poems and Lyrics of the Joy of Earth, Lon., 1883, p. 8vo.

"If verse were simply quintessential prose, then assuredly Mr. Meredith would be one of the most effective poets living. In the art of 'packing a line' he is almost without living equal. . . . Manliness and intellectual vigour, combined with a remarkable picturesqueness, are the most noticeable qualities of his volume."—Ath., No. 2909.

16. Diana of the Crossways, Lon., 1885, 3 vols. p. 8vo. (The heroine is understood to represent Mrs. Caroline Norton.)

"It is a study of character, and it is also a study of emotion; it is a picture of fact and the world, and it is touched with generous romance; it is rich in kindly comedy, and it abounds in natural passion; it sets forth a selection of many human elements, and is joyful and sorrowful, wholesome with laughter and fruitful of tears, as life itself. In one word, it is a common novel, as 'Amelia' is, and 'Vanity Fair.' It ends as happily as the feeblest and flimsiest of visions in three volumes, and is only distinguished from the ruck of its contemporaries in being the work of a man of genius and a great artist."—Ath., No. 2994.

"Whether Mr. Meredith's apologia for witty and beautiful ladies who love to skate upon thin ice is a successful one, may be doubted. But as a literary display the novel is unequalled. It is written with a cleverness that is almost painful; epigrammatic sentences, phrases stuffed to bursting with meaning, make up, with the least possible matrix of padding, a literary mosaic as perplexing often to the ordinary novel-reader as an Aristophanic chorus to a school-boy, or Mr. Browning to an exoteric public. But with some patience these difficulties may be overcome, and the reward is not small. The novel is decidedly the best Mr. Meredith has given to the world. The diner-out will find it a very storehouse of pungent and pregnant texts; the social philosopher will be dazzled and delighted by the flashes of electric light thrown upon various aspects of his subject; and the literary expert will be no less charmed by the knowledge, fertility, and dexterity apparent in every page,—it might well be said, in every sentence."—Spectator, lviii. 417.

17. Ballads and Poems of Tragic Life, Lon., 1887, 12mo.

"It certainly cannot be said that, as the years go on, the streams of Mr. Meredith's song become more and more pellucid. . . . His last production—these 'Ballads and Poems of Tragic Life'—is certainly one of the most difficult volumes of verse that it has ever been our fate to read."—Acad., xxxi. 406.

18. A Reading of Earth, [verse,] 1888, p. 8vo. (No copies sent out for review.)

General Criticism:

"To be concentrated in form, to be suggestive in material, to say nothing that is not of permanent value, and only to say it in such terms as are charged to the fullest with significance,—this would seem to be the aim and end of Mr. Meredith's ambition. Of simplicity in his own person he seems incapable. The texture of his expression must be stiff with allusion, or he deems it ill-spun; there must be something of antic in his speech, or he cannot believe he is addressing the Immortals."—Ath., No. 3111.

"His books are always interesting, and yet, paradoxical as the saying may seem, we are interested neither in the personages themselves nor in what happens to them. We read simply that we may know what Mr. Meredith has to say, and that we may enjoy his manner of saying it."—James Ashcroft Noble: Acad., xxvii. 147.

"It cannot be denied by those who have read Mr. Meredith's books that there is much in them to justify not a cult, but a genuine admiration. But the real difficulty in the case is to read them or get them read. There are those, perhaps, who love his style, as we may learn to love the disagreeable features of an old friend's face; but they cannot expect to convert the public into liking it, any more than such facial eccentricities can be made Academy models. Apart from friends so gained, Mr. Meredith's readers or would-be readers may be divided into those who think him so desperately clever that it is impossible to read him, and those who cannot help reading him any more than they can help regretting at every second page that he should write as he does."—Spectator, lix. 1381.

But we must take them as Mr. Merivale himself presents them to us, as partial illustrations of particular aspects of the subject, or as suggestions for inquiry. So far as they enter into the question, they do so with great freshness of view, great appreciation of the surrounding state of things, great honesty, much largeness of mind and generosity of sentiment. They are powerfully and eloquently written."—Sat. Rev., xviii. 695.

What he has given us, however, is not a history, or even an historical dissertation, but rather a set of historical sermons on the leading religious ideas which the conversion, in its different episodes and phases, suggests. The style of the work is distinctly that of the pulpit."—Sat. Rev., xx. 786.

"Mr. Bowles's life was conspicuously uneventful: and the history of his times was a necessary crutch to any biographer who adopted the scale which has seemed to Mr. Merriam not disproportionate to his subject. The political narrative alternates with the letters, and will, we dare say, have an interest for the generation now on the stage, and a certain convenience for their elders, particularly in Massachusetts."—Nation, xli. 553.

"From Beirut . . . Mr. Merrill . . . made four different expeditions into the interior. Of these, however, the journals of but two are given at length in the present volume, and these are rather an account of the journeys than a record of results achieved. . . . As a book of travels it takes high rank. Mr. Merrill's sketches of the land, the scenery, and the people east of the Jordan are fresh, vigorous, and full of life."—Nation, xxxiii. 378.

"Merriton, Mervyn," (Pseud.) See COAPE, HENRY COE, supra.

Merritt, Henry, 1822–1877, b. at Oxford; served an apprenticeship of seven years to a firm of gilders and carvers; subsequently went to London, where for a few years he lived in great poverty while struggling to become an artist, but finally made a profession of restoring old pictures, in which he displayed extraordinary talent and skill, and was employed by many public institutions and wealthy connoisseurs. He also wrote art criticisms, and a few works of fiction. Shortly before his death he married Miss Anna Lea, of Philadelphia, who has become distinguished as a portrait-painter. 1. (This includes "Dust and Pictures Separated," "Selections from Occasional Writings," "A Story of a Flower," (first published in Ruskin's "Fors Clavigera,") "Robert Dalby," and "The Oxford Professor and the Artist.")

"We have not often read so moving a record told with such firm and quiet self-control. . . . The 'Art Criticism' . . . is most distinctly of a mediocre character. . . . The 'romance' of this book consists of two stories, 'Robert Dalby' and 'The Oxford Professor.' The former has long been out of print, the latter is published here for the first time. The first is by far the best of the two, though as a work of fiction neither can claim to rank high. . . . But if Merritt lacked imagination, his powers of observation were of a very high order indeed. In no work of modern fiction, not even in 'David Copperfield,' have the author's own experiences been turned to such good account. Both of these stories are mines of autobiography, and, good as we have called his biography, it must be admitted that his autobiography is better."—Spectator, lii. 1076.

"Mr. Michell has done good service to history by publishing the results of his careful researches. . . . It is . . . probable that many a Norwegian will receive with little favour some of the historical facts now brought to light by Mr. Michell, as they will to some extent diminish the glory and the romance that hitherto have surrounded the story of the Scottish expedition."—Ath., No. 3061.

"Mr. Mill begins by tracing very shortly the growth of the conception of liberty. After showing how it meant, in early times, the possession of immunities on the part of subjects which their rulers were not to be allowed to infringe,—and how to this succeeded the theory of a delegation by the nation, to a certain number of agents, of powers to be exercised for the common good,—he shows how in our own day the process must be carried a step further, and how the rights of individuals must be protected against the oppression of society at large. . . . We do not think it would have been possible to convey in the same space a greater quantity of matter which is not only valuable, but absolutely vital."—Sat. Rev., vii. 186.

"The book is composed with the thoughtful care and finish of style which have made the writer's works popular notwithstanding the dryness and abstruseness of many of the subjects which he treated. Probably no scholar or philosopher has left an equally full and faithful history of his education and his intellectual life. The unconscious revelations of character which are often the most valuable part of an autobiography bear an unusually small proportion to the deliberate narrative, because Mr. Mill's purpose of writing a candid account of his life was made effective by his long practice of psychological observation."—Sat. Rev., xxxvi. 570.

"The book will be found, we think, even by Mr. Mill's most strenuous disciples, a dreary one. It shows that, in spite of all Mr. Mill's genuine and generous compassion for human misery and his keen desire to alleviate it, his relation to concrete humanity was of a very confined and reserved kind. . . . His nature was composed of a few very fine threads, but wanted a certain strength of basis, and the general effect, though one of high and even enthusiastic disinterestedness, is meagre and pallid."—Spectator, xlvi. 1337.

"I have never read a more uninteresting book, nor, I should say, a sillier, by a man of sense, integrity, and seriousness of mind. . . . It is wholly the life of a logic-chopping engine, little more of human in it than if it had been done by a thing of macadamized iron. . . . As a mournful psychical curiosity, but in no other point of view, can it interest anybody."—T. CARLYLE: Letter to Dr. J. Carlyle, ap. Froude, Carlyle's Life in London, Amer. ed., ii. 358.

13. Nature, the Utility of Religion, and Theism: Three Essays, Lon., 1874, 8vo; 3d ed., 1885.

"They are rather outlines than dissertations, outlines which require filling up to produce their full effect on the reader. . . . Consider, for instance, how exceedingly faint and imperfect is his exposition here of the most remarkable and characteristic idea of this work. That idea we take to be that the existence of pain and evil, and even of contrivance and design, in the universe, is in itself ample evidence that the Creator of it, if there be a Creator, is either greatly limited in power, or morally imperfect, or both. This is the idea running through all the essays."—Spectator, xlvii. 1366.

Miller, Cincinnatus Hiner, (known as "Joaquin Miller,") b. 1841, in Wabash District, Ind.; removed with his parents to Oregon in 1854; became a miner in California, and afterwards studied law. In 1861 he was an express agent in the gold-mining districts of Idaho; in 1863 he edited the Democratic Register, a weekly newspaper in Eugene, Oregon, which was suppressed for disloyalty. He then opened a law-office in Canyon City, Oregon. In 1866–70 he was judge of Grant County, Oregon. Having published a paper in defence of Joaquin Murietta, the Mexican brigand, he took the first name of his hero as a signature to a volume of poems. In 1870 he went to England and also travelled in Southern Europe. After his return to the United States he became a journalist in Washington, D.C., and in 1887 he returned to California. He has written several successful plays, including The Danites. 1. Songs of the Sierras, Bost., 1871, 16mo.

"A new poet has come to us from a new country. . . . Whatever the faults of style which disfigure Mr. Miller's poems,—and they are many and flagrant,—there can be no doubt that he possesses the genuine poetic faculty. . . . The fact that his lines glow with tropical passion, and that his descriptions transport us in imagination to the scenes among which they were composed, compels us to forgive him the lawlessness with which he tramples on the conventional limitations of art."—Sat. Rev., xxxi. 808.

"The best poem in Mr. Miller's small volume is the first one, which bears the title of 'Arizonian.' . . . It is well conceived, and, also, some of the details are successful. . . . The other poems have all the faults of 'Arizonian,' and none, or next to none, of its merits, and have, besides, abundant faults of their own."—Nation, xiii. 196.

"Although we cannot give Mr. Miller a front place in the hierarchy of modern poets, we are glad to welcome him as a true and original singer."—Ath., No. 2275.

2. Songs of the Sunlands, Bost., 1873, 16mo.

"This volume may be pronounced an improvement on the former one in the sense of being less raw and crude in sentiment; . . . though we should doubt if there were anything really as poetical in conception as the 'Arizonian.'"—Nation, xviii. 77.

"'The One Fair Woman' is not a satisfactory book. At the same time it is a very remarkable book, one which we do not hesitate to say that no one not a born poet could have written. There are passages in it of great beauty, but there is no plot, no action, and no character, and it is not a novel."—Ath., No. 2526.

"The 'Songs of Italy' have the same spontaneous vigor, the same vividness and originality of imagery, the same lack of proportion, of taste and thought, the same excellences and defects, as the 'Songs of the Sierras;' although their distribution is perhaps more even."—Nation, xxvii. 336.

"It is impossible to read 'Poverty and the State' without a kindly feeling towards its author. He sympathizes so deeply with the distress of the poor, and so completely believes in the remedy which he proposes, that criticism is to some extent disarmed. Moreover, Mr. Mills's suggestions have much that is attractive in them. He wishes to sweep away the present Poor Law, with its out-door and in-door relief. All charities and almsgiving are to be rendered superfluous, if not actually abolished. Workhouses, with their abuses and waste of money, are to be superseded, and, instead of those many and ineffectual ways of relieving distress, 'Co-operative Estates' are to be established throughout the country."—*Sat. "Those who read the book for its personal narrative ... will scarcely be able to understand that for others it may prove less attractive; and could our notice be confined to these aspects of the subject there would be nothing but praise to bestow. But a much larger class of readers will expect to find information as to India and Indian affairs, . . . and especially to be helped towards a conclusion concerning the much-debated results of missionary enterprise in the East. . . . Such expectations could not be realized."—Spectator, liii. 466.

"The book has all the freshness and vigour of the earlier works which won Dean Milman his fame. . . . What is most wonderful in the 'Annals of St. Paul's' is the power with which the Dean has grasped the exact subject he had chosen, and the artistic fidelity with which he has grouped men and events around it. . . . The book is such wonderfully pleasant reading that one may miss noticing the exquisite art with which every element of mediæval society is brought within the precinct or the choir. . . . All this varied and picturesque life of the past is not merely painted in antiquarian fashion, but swept into the general current of his history by the Dean's fine sense of historical continuity. . . . We could have wished that, though left unfinished by the death of its author, it were not disfigured, not merely by a host of misprints, but by some blunders which the Dean's secundæ curæ would certainly have removed. . . . The book, in fact, wants careful revision."—Sat. Rev., xxvii. 22.

"If we were asked what it is which constitutes the specific claim of Lord Houghton's poetry to a certain modest place of its own in the poetry of our day, we should say it was the intertwining in his mind between the threads of tender sentiment and that kind of knowledge of the world which is so apt to take all the melody out of sentiment." —Spectator, xlix. 625.

Mitchel, F. A. Ormsby Macknight Mitchel, Astronomer and General: a Biographical Narrative. By his Son. Bost., 1887, 8vo.

"It is an attractive story from his infancy onward. . . . Gen. Mitchel's military career was a great disappointment to him and to those who were close to him. . . . The lesson of his previous career is full of encouragement for every generous-minded youth, and shows triumph after triumph in his progress from poverty without education towards competence and acknowledged scientific eminence. Useful and pleasing as this lesson is, that which is taught by his career on the field of great events, in a time that must always fill a great page in history, seems more important by reason of this connection."—Nation, xlvi. 55.

Mitchel, John, 1815–1875, b. at Dungiven, County Londonderry, Ireland, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin; practised for some time as a solicitor, and in 1845 became editor of the Nation, the organ of the Nationalist party in Ireland. In 1847 he separated himself from that party and started The United Irishman, and in 1848 was sentenced to fourteen years' penal servitude for treason-felony. In 1853 he escaped from Van Diemen's Land and settled in the United States, where he edited the Citizen in New York, and during the civil war the Richmond Enquirer. In 1875, shortly before his death, he was elected M.P. for Tipperary, but the election was contested on the ground that he was a felon who had not worked out his sentence. Tales of Old Japan: with Illustrations drawn and cut on Wood by Japanese Artists, Lon., 1871, 8vo; 2d ed., 1874.

"The most interesting of the stories collected by Mr. Mitford are undoubtedly the 'Fairy-Tales,' for in them the links become clearly visible which unite the folk-lore of Japan with that of the Indo-European nations. . . . Great credit is due to Mr. Mitford for the care he has taken in the work of translation. He has successfully rendered the Japanese idioms with truth and exactness into pleasant and readable English, and has added much to the interest of his work by the illustrative commentary he has been able to supply on the manners and customs of the people gathered from his own experiences in the Land of the Rising Sun."—*Sat. "Poor though this narrative is as a whole, yet in parts we have found it interesting. It is not everywhere smothered beneath the weight of words which the author has laid on it. His journey in itself was in one respect a very surprising one. Through a wild country over which we had carried a fierce war so short a while before, amidst a race of men who, however much they may have raised themselves above their neighbours, nevertheless are savages, he was able to travel in perfect safety."—*Sat. Mivart, St. George, M.D., Ph.D., F.R.S., b. 1827, in London; was educated at Harrow School, and at King's College, London, and, having become a Roman Catholic in 1844, finished his studies at St. Mary's College, Oscott; called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn 1851; became lecturer at St. Mary's Hospital Medical School 1862, and professor of biology at University College, Kensington, 1874. He has been vice-president of the Zoological Society and secretary of the Linnæan Society, and has contributed largely to the publications of learned societies, to scientific and literary reviews, and to the Ninth Edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. 1. On the Genesis of Species, Lon., 1871, p. 8vo; 2d ed. same year.

"In no work in the English language has this great controversy been treated at once with the same broad and vigorous grasp of facts and the same liberal and candid temper. . . . What Mr. Mivart insists upon is that the theory of Natural Selection, however supplemented and aided by that of Pangenesis, though true, is not the whole truth; that it can be shown to be quite insufficient to explain a number of important phenomena connected with the Origin of Species, and that it must, in consequence, itself be capable of being merged in some higher law, aided and supplemented by some more recondite agency."—Sat. Rev., xxxi. 179.

"Though by no means disposed originally to dissent from the theory of Natural Selection, if only its difficulties could be solved, he [the author] has found each successive year that deeper consideration and more careful examination have more and more brought home to him the inadequacy of Mr. Darwin's theory to account for the preservation and intensification of incipient, specific, and genuine characters. That minute, fortuitous, and indefinite variations could have brought about such special forms and modifications as have been enumerated in this chapter seems to contradict, not imagination, but reason."—Extract from the work.

"If any man will take counsel and learn how that the doctrine of evolution is a most orthodox opinion, and has been opportunely raised up in these latter days as a singular confirmation of Papal infallibility, and for a witness to the never-failing discretion of the Church in dealing with matters of profane science; that the thing itself tends altogether to the advantage of the Church aforesaid, insomuch that in some moderate space of time all heresies and oppositions will, by mere form of natural selection, be clean exterminated, and the civilized world happily restored to the obedience of the See of Rome and the peripatetic philosophy; finally, that 'the culmination of the process' of evolution 'has been the great Vatican decree, the keystone of the great arch of civil and religious liberty,'—all these things and more he shall find abundantly and magisterially demonstrated by Mr. Mivart in the compass of some two hundred and fifty pages, and a chapter on ecclesiastical architecture into the bargain. . . . His book is, after all, a perfect jewel of paradox."—Sat. Rev., xli. 811.

6. Lessons from Nature, as manifested in Mind and Matter, Lon., 1876, 8vo.

"Mr. Darwin is not in fairness to be held responsible for the extremes to which his conclusions may have been pushed by eager speculators in the direction of agnosticism or even of nihilism. Against negative or destructive theories such as these Mr. Mivart does battle with a vigour and an acuteness worthy of all praise. In special parts of Mr. Darwin's own armour he also finds vulnerable points. The theory of sexual selection, in particular, as developed in the 'Descent of Man,' meets with much genuine and powerful criticism, which forms indeed the most successful part of the present volume."—Sat. Rev., xlii. 271.

7. The Cat: an Introduction to the Study of Backboned Animals, especially Mammals. Illust. Lon., 1881, 8vo.

"Of the fifteen chapters into which Dr. Mivart's book is divided, nine . . . seem to us to contain an admirably clear and concise account of the animal's structure and development. . . . High as our author stands in our estimation as a descriptive anatomist, he wholly fails, if not to appreciate the interest which surrounds the Cat, with its remarkably obscure history, at least to illustrate it sufficiently."—Spectator, liv. 1471.

here and there an original thought or suggestion of some value."—Spectator, lvi. 238.

"For a biography of Margaret in the literal sense of the word, no sufficient materials exist, and such as there are can in no way be confidently relied on. A worthless and very scurrilous pamphlet is the only professed contemporary record we know of, 'Memoirs of the Celebrated Mrs. Woffington.' . . . Mr. Molloy . . . has evidently seen it too, though he does not say so. All the early chapters of his first volume are merely an elaborate version of this pamphlet, without the scurrility. "A book which preserves more perfectly than any other boating-book I ever read the gaiety and good temper which boating fosters and encourages. . . . "The four church-forms, or experiments in Church and State, which constitute the chief subject discussed by the author, are designated as, First, the National Churches which have been established in England, where the lay and clerical elements are balanced; . . . Second, the Eastern Church in Russia, where that Church is a mere political tool of the State; Third, the Church of Rome, which overrides the State; and Fourth, Americanism, or the way of the Sectaries, under which the State is unconnected with a Church, which can hardly be said to exist where the clerical element is of little account, but under which system, as under the despotic form of Wesleyan religious administration in this country, the author discerns forms intimately allied with that of Rome. . . . The outline we have drawn is cleverly filled up."—Ath., No. 1893.

"Mr. Washington Moon has done such good service to the study of English, and the latter part of this little book is so well worth reading, that we can only express our unfeigned sorrow that he should have written the first half of it. This contains little else than a string of erroneous statements which would have been out of date a century ago. We cannot conscientiously recommend a volume which says that 'the English language is derived chiefly from the Aryan through the Sanskrit, and thence through the Celtic, Italic, and Teutonic;' which supposes the Book of Job to be 'the most ancient document extant;' and which exhibits the most stolid ignorance about the derivation of the Phœnician from the Egyptian alphabet."—Acad., xix. 390.

"In virtue of its vividness of presentation and real literary skill, it may be regarded as in some degree a representative example of the work of a literary school that has of late years attracted to itself a good deal of the notoriety which is a very useful substitute for fame. . . . It consists of a series of studies of moral and physical disease, in which every symptom is described with a fulness and realizableness of detail that is, in the most literal sense of the word, simply nauseous."—Spectator, lviii. 83.

"Mr. George Moore has already proved his right to be considered one of the conspicuous novelists of the day. On account of his unsavoury taste his books have attracted, perhaps, more than their due share of attention, but they have deserved much in spite of it. . . . Mr. Moore can depict human beings in an original and consistent fashion; he can tell a story well, and he has an excellent eye for effect. . . . The novelty of his method lies, however, not so much in his topics as in the nature of his analysis. He is on the lookout to detect the baser impulses, and even in the outside view of things a nasty detail has for him an irresistible attraction."—Ath., No. 3065.

"His book is divided into four parts, headed respectively: I. Growth of Intelligence through Inventions and Discoveries. II. Growth of the Idea of Government. III. Growth of the Idea of Family. IV. Growth of the Idea of Property. The first part is devoted mainly to the establishment of what Mr. Morgan calls 'ethnical periods,' of which he recognizes three,—savagery, barbarism, and civilization. . . .

". . . The second part . . . demands full attention. . . . He acknowledges three classes succeeding each other,—viz., society based upon difference of sex; society based upon kin; political society, based upon territory and property. . . . By scanning the earth's surface, even to the remotest isles, our author has succeeded in preserving for us the most important features of life among races that are fast vanishing. These features he has judiciously connected with the oldest records—mythical, traditional, and historical—of humanity, and thus spun a thread which, at a given point, is sure to pass through any branch or tribe. It is not so much an historical as an ethnological guide, which no one can neglect who intends to devote some attention to human antiquity, as well as to the study of such living peoples as are yet without the pale of modern civilization."—Nation, xxv. 92.

"What Mr. Morgan has added to our stock of facts will endure, but his theories are doomed to rapid natural decay."—Sat. Rev., xlv. 19.

"The author has built up a structure of theory wider and heavier than his foundations of facts will bear. His scheme will hardly be accepted as a whole, but parts of it may stand as permanent additions to the science of man." —EDWARD B. TYLOR: Acad., xiv. 67.

Morison, James Augustus Cotter, M.A., 1831-1888, b. in London; educated at Cholmeley Grammar-School, Highgate, and at Lincoln College, Oxford, where he graduated 1859; was one of the founders and original proprietors of the Fortnightly Review, and contributed largely to that and to other leading English periodicals. Much of his work was intended as a preparation for a history of France, a project which he had long in view, but was unable to carry out. For some time previous to his death he suffered from a wasting illness, and his last book was written in a sick-room. 1. The Life and Times of St. Bernard, Abbot of Clairvaux, Lon., 1863, p. 8vo; new eds., 1868, 1877.

"Mr. Morison has one eminent qualification for the biographer of a man like St. Bernard, and one eminent disqualification. The qualification is a rare faculty of insight and sympathy, which . . . enables him to comprehend, not merely justly or even generously, but really and completely, his hero's position in relation to his times and to the progress of human history. . . . His disqualification is one which he shares with some other distinguished writers who have wished to do justice to great mediæval names. . . . He views religion, the spiritual life of the Christian soul, only from the outside; fairly, admiringly, in a higher and worthier way than very many religious men, yet still only from the outside."—*Sat. "An admirable study of Gibbon's life and work. . . . It has simplicity, sincerity, and force. . . . It is the judgment of one historical writer by another, who well knows what the labour is and what are the true tests of success in it. . . . His criticism of Gibbon as an historian, and the general remarks on historical study into which his criticism leads him, though to our mind the most valuable portion of his book, are only allowed to occupy the limited though prominent place which belongs to them in a study of Gibbon's life as a whole, while for the rest we have an effective and well-balanced sketch of Gibbon's life and personal character, based mainly, of course, on the Autobiography and journals, but making judicious use of other materials when necessary."—*Sat. "It is essentially a book of spiritual assistance (for Agnosticism requires such as well as any more orthodox creed) for those men and women whom natural endowment and accidental circumstances have led on to think and feel in opposition to the old ways of thinking and feeling, but only up to a certain point, where they are either tempted to retrace their steps or to tarry in doubt and uselessness. . . . For such souls as these Mr. Cotter Morison has traced an onward road."—"Vernon Lee:" Acad., xxxi. 86.

"This book is the most powerful attack on Christianity that has been produced in England during this generation. . . . Mr. Morison speaks as if he had something positive to offer instead of the dogmas he would depose; but, unfortunately, ill health has disturbed his plan, and the book remains a fragment, with the positive part only indicated in the last two chapters and the title of the book."—Ath. No. 3092.

"It cannot, indeed, be recommended as a safe guide for students to whom minute accuracy is of importance; but as a popular book it has decided merits. Prof. Morley knows, what some writers of far greater learning seem not to know, that literature is a thing to be enjoyed, and not merely a subject for critical or philological analysis; and he has succeeded in being thoroughly interesting even when dealing with the most unpromising parts of his subject."—HENRY BRADLEY: Acad., xxxiii. 197.

3. Voltaire, Lon., 1871, 8vo; 3d ed., 1878.

"We do not think that the accepted estimate of Voltaire is in any danger of being seriously disturbed by Mr. Morley's volume, or indeed by anything that is likely to be discovered or written about him in these days. Mr. Morley is disposed to rank Voltaire, with Luther and Calvin, among the spiritual regenerators of the world. . . . Upon the facts of Voltaire's life Mr. Morley does not pretend to throw any new light. . . . It is impossible to read his volume without being struck by its independence of thought, its sincerity and candour of expression, as well as by its ability and literary power. . . . Mr. Morley has given us a valuable and highly suggestive study of the great man of a very critical age, and we only wish he could have persuaded himself to have given us this and nothing more. . . . and refrained from loose digressions upon questions of the day, which disturb the artistic unity and diminish the scientific value of the work."—*Sat. "A series of five vigorous essays, . . . the object of which is, according to the author, 'to consider, in a short and direct way, some of the limits that are set by sound reason to the practice of the various arts of accommodation, economy, management, conformity, or compromise.'"—Ath., No. 2451.

7. Diderot and the Encyclopædists, Lon., 1878, 2 vols. 8vo: new ed., 1879, 1 vol. p. 8vo.

"The biography of the chief founder and conductor of the Encyclopædia is not in Mr. Morley's hands a mere peg on which to hang a dissertation, but is set before us as an example of what Encyclopædists were. . . . If Mr. Morley has a fault in these volumes, it is that he is a little too long."—Sat. Rev., xlvi. 309.

8. Burke, ("English Men of Letters,") Lon., 1879, p. 8vo.

"Perhaps the best criticism yet published on the life and character of Burke is contained in Mr. Morley's compendious biography."—Sat. Rev., xlviii. 208.

"A singularly just, elevated, and sympathetic study of the character and career of that 'master of statesmen.'"—Spectator, lii. 1441.

The author defended himself against certain strictures on matters of fact in an article entitled "A Word with some Critics," Fortnightly Review, October, 1879. A rejoinder on some of these points will be found in the Academy, vol. xvi. pp. 285–87, where the critic, Mr. E. J. Payne, says, in conclusion, "Mr. Morley's account of nine-tenths of Burke's life is to me complete and truthful; . . . the total result is a masterpiece such as Mr. Morley alone could have produced, and such as he may well contemplate with satisfaction."

9. The Life of Richard Cobden. Lon., 1881, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Morley's masterly work will perpetuate the memory of his [Cobden's] achievements, and it may perhaps involuntarily disguise his not infrequent failures. . . . He was, on the whole, enviable in his public career and in his private life; nor has any one of his contemporaries thus far been so fortunate in a biographer."—Sat. Rev., lii. 637.

"The vigour and truthfulness with which he has traced Cobden's career as a public man and his relations with all the public movements in which he took part are equalled by the tact and grace with which, having access to all the private letters and memoranda extant, he has set forth as much as need be told about his personal history and his relations with his friends and kindred."—Ath., No. 2818.

10. Ralph Waldo Emerson: an Essay, Lon. and N. York, 1884.

Morris, Lewis, M.A., b. 1834, at Carmarthen, Wales; great-grandson of Lewis Morris, (ante, vol. ii.;) educated at Cowbridge and Sherborne Schools, and at Jesus College, Oxford, where he graduated, first class Lit. Hum., 1856, and gained the Chancellor's prize; called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn 1861, and practised, chiefly as conveyancing counsel, till 1880. In 1877 he was elected an honorary Fellow of Jesus College, Oxford; he received the order of the Saviour from the King of Greece, and in the same year was made honorary secretary of the University College of Wales. He resides at Penbryn House, Carmarthenshire, is a justice of the peace for the county, and was a Liberal candidate for Parliament in 1881 and in 1886, but was not elected. His poems have achieved great popularity. 1. Songs of Two Worlds. By a New Writer. Lon., 1871, 12mo.

"Everything that is best in the volume seems to us to point to power of this peculiar kind, if the writer be destined for poetical greatness at all,—the power of blending criticism with poetry so as to infuse the spirit of intellectual discrimination with a lyrical feeling. . . . While here and there there is a tendency to excess of phraseology, . . . the greater part of this volume is very pleasant and harmonious verse, the verse of a thoughtful mind and of a delicate spirit."—Spectator, xlv. 213.

2. Songs of Two Worlds. Second Series. Lon., 1874, 12mo.

"It is recognized that the journalist who says articulately what the average cultivated man thinks inarticulately performs a useful and indispensable function: the 'New Writer' has shown his ability to perform worthily the analogous function of singing what the average cultivated man feels inarticulately."—G. A. SIMCOX: Acad., vi. 115.

3. Songs of Two Worlds. Third Series. Lon., 1875, 12mo. New edition of the three series, 1878, 1 vol.

"What the 'new poet' alone wants to make him a poet of note and power is something of added intensity which should change the sweetness of delicate musings into something having an organic substance of its own, whose shape and essence would remain with us after the delicate turn of the words and the peculiar complexion of the mood were forgotten. . . . Our author has, we cannot doubt, proved his capacity to shape conceptions which will lay a strong hold of our minds, and to embody them in a music which will not easily die out of our hearts."—Spectator, xlviii. 662.

4. The Epic of Hades. By the Author of "Songs of Two Worlds." Lon., 1876, 3 vols. 12mo. (The volume first published forms Book II. of the whole work.)

"Among his lyrical poems, the author of 'Songs of Two Worlds' has given us pieces which if they had appeared under Mr. Tennyson's name would have taken a high place among his poems of the same class. The present is a specimen of his powers in another style, and one with which of late years his master's reputation has been even more identified, namely, the idyllic; for it is to this class that the poems contained in the present volume . . . must be said to belong. They are nothing if not little pictures, which we take to be the meaning of the word idylls; and beautiful little pictures many of them are."—Ath., No. 2525.

"Imbued from youth with the spirit of classic poetry, till it has become a part of his being, a sort of loyalty to both worlds fits him for the task of blending the lights and shades of myth-land with the clearer truth of the fulness of time; and a simple and lucid style, a spontaneous power of song, and a bright, fearless fancy enable him to seize and retain the sympathies of his audience."—Sat. Rev., xliii. 393.

5. Gwen: a Drama in Monologue, in Six Acts. By the Author of "The Epic of Hades." Lon., 1879, 12mo.

"The author of the 'Epic of Hades' has been singularly favoured. From the first he has been warmly welcomed by the public, and received generous, indeed almost lavish, praise from the critics. . . . The range of the author is a wide one. He has felt the poetical significance of ancient myths and the beauty of classic story, and so felt it as to give to what was partially dead a new life and meaning; he has gained inspiration from themes which inspired Dante, and has not feared to awaken memories of that divine poet; he has sung sweet songs and musical lyrics, and, whether writing in rhyme or blank verse, has proved himself a master of his instrument. . . . It does not follow, however, that the poet, for such he unquestionably is, has proved his title to a place among the immortals. His work, admirable though it be, must still, in a large measure, be regarded as tentative, and curiosity is mingled with the pleasure with which we take up a fresh volume of his verse. There is no originality in the slight plot which links together the six acts of 'Gwen,' and the form in which the tale is presented will be familiar to readers of recent poetry. . . . Here and there, too, we meet with passages obviously suggested by earlier poets. . . . The author of 'Gwen' writes simply, and is content to find the theme of his song in a familiar and even commonplace story. But he knows, like all true poets, how to transmute what may be called common into the pure gold of poetry."—Spectator, lii. 952.

6. The Ode of Life, Lon., 1880, 12mo. 7. Songs Unsung, Lon., 1883, 12mo.

"The present work undoubtedly shows many familiar characteristics of Mr. Morris; there is the same tender musing over classical legends, the same irresistible desire to 'point the moral' as well as 'adorn the tale;' the same pleasing yet rather monotonous blank verse. We do not find, however, any of those 'flashes of fervid youth' that illuminated here and there the 'Songs of Two Worlds,' nor any passage, perhaps, of such finished exaltation as the close of 'Marsyas' in the 'Epic of Hades.' On the other hand, what may be called the pictorial faculty—the faculty of showing a scene, a landscape, a face, a vision, in one short phrase or quatrain—has been markedly developed."—Acad., xxiv. 343.

8. Gycia: a Tragedy, in Five Acts, Lon., 1886, 12mo. 9. Songs of Britain, Lon., 1887, 12mo. 10. Poetical Works, Collected Edition, 4 vols: vol. i., Songs of Two Worlds, 12th ed.; vol. ii., The Epic of Hades, 22d ed.; vol. iii., Gwen, and the Ode of Life, 7th ed.; vol. iv., Songs Unsung, and Gycia, 5th ed.

General Criticism:

"If popularity be the test of worth, Mr. Morris's merit as a poet is unequivocal. . . . When we set ourselves to see what it is exactly in Mr. Morris's poetry that has had so strong an appeal for our generation of readers, there is no difficulty in perceiving that it is primarily the moral sympathy pervading it, the humanity, the feeling of brotherhood, added to what used to be called didacticism and is now known as religiosity. It has been more than once remarked that Mr. Morris stands between Mr. Tennyson and the people, and owes his acceptance as a poet to the skill with which he interprets the Laureate to those who know nothing of, and care nothing for, the higher poetic art. This statement, as explanatory of the fact that the author of the 'Epic of Hades' is one of the poetic forces of the time, has one angle of truth, and one only. . . . Mr. Lewis Morris is a realist; he brings a quick eye for the world's outward manifestations, and a ready sympathy for its human foibles and failures."—Ath., No. 2925.

"A book whose value we think we do not exaggerate when we say that it makes an era in the study of the English tongue. We have at last an historical grammar of the English language which really recognizes what the English language is. . . . When we read his accurate and scientific account of the origin of the English tongue and of its relations to other tongues, the main thing that strikes us is, how clear, how simple, the whole thing is. . . . The only fault that we have to find is one that Dr. Morris himself hopes to remedy. His present book is not quite a book for beginners. He says, 'I have endeavoured to write a book that can be profitably used by students or by the upper forms in our public schools; a very elementary book formed no part of my plan.'"—*Sat. Morris, William, b. 1834, at Walthamstow, Eng.; educated at Marlborough College, and at Exeter College, Oxford, where he took his degree in 1856, and in the same year founded the Oxford and Cambridge Magazine, which he supported during the year of its existence, and to which he contributed poems, romantic stories, and critical articles. After studying architecture for a time, he started in 1863, with several partners, an establishment in London for the manufacture of artistic wall-paper, stained glass, and other materials of household decoration, in which he has since worked as a designer. The business, which is now carried on under his name alone, has been an important agent in the revolution of taste in England in matters of decorative art. Of late years Mr. Morris has become a leading spirit of the Socialist League, and much of his recent work has been done in the columns of its organ, The Commonweal. 1. The Defence of Guenevere, and other Poems, Lon., 1858, p. 8vo.

"Disposed as we are to recognize all who cultivate poetry honestly, whatever be the style,—and admitting that Mr. Morris may be counted among that choir,—we must call attention to his book of Pre-Raphaelite minstrelsy as to a curiosity which shows how far affectation may mislead an earnest man towards the fog-land of Art."—Ath., No. 1588.

"Nearly ten years have passed since Mr. Morris published his 'Defence of Guenevere, and other Poems,' and it is a new proof of the vitality inherent in true poetry that a volume which attracted little attention at the period of its issue, or indeed for some time afterwards, has gradually gained for itself an increasing audience amongst men of imaginative tastes."—Ath., No. 2068.

2. The Life and Death of Jason, Lon., 1867, p. 8vo; 7th ed., 1877.

"In the execution of a plan embracing persons so dignified and an action so romantic, Mr. Morris has displayed poetic qualities rare in themselves, and especially rare in these days, when poets, amongst others, have too much conformed to the public impatience of high Art. . . . Throughout, Mr. Morris assumes the part of a chronicler who has a tale to tell the interest of which is to be found in the events, and not in the chances which they afford for imaginative display. Many readers, consequently, will peruse page after page of 'Jason' without being startled into admiration; but the charm of the narrative will, we think, grow upon them by degrees, until they know at last that the smooth river upon which they have been borne is a strong though even current. To leave metaphor, so thoroughly has Mr. Morris shunned all parade, that the happiness of epithet and of local colouring, the picturesque detail and the appropriate phrase, which give life and individuality to his pictures, are for the most part known only by their effects and only fully appreciated in the retrospect."—Ath., No. 2068.

"A collection of tales, classical and mediæval, in much the same sort of setting as the tales of Boccaccio or Chaucer. . . . Every situation is made the most of within the limits of a chaste and refined fancy,—a fancy, too, that does not escape into the favourite by-path of modern days, by regarding the mythic heroes and heroines as the impersonations of natural phenomena, or explaining them away upon the 'bow-wow' principle. With him mortals and immortals live and breathe, eat and drink, love and hate, and he asks no questions, neither perplexes his readers with any doubts, keeping well before his mind that his office is that of the rhapsodist of old. The impress of familiarity with classic fable is stamped on his pages, and echoes of the Greek are wafted to us from afar both delicately and imperceptibly."—Sat. Rev., xxv. 730.

4. Love is Enough; or, The Freeing of Pharamond: a Morality, Lon., 1872, 16mo; new ed., 1873.

"Whether we consider the skill with which he handles a difficult Middle-English metre, little used by moderns, and known but to students through the 'Vision of Piers Ploughman,' so as to give it a new hold upon us, or the grace of his conception, or the charm of words with which he has worked it out, we are equally impressed by the poet's power."—Sat. Rev., xxxiv. 737.

"This kind of poetry always produces on our imagination an effect somewhat resembling the impression received on looking at a familiar landscape through the mellow emblazonry of a painted casement. We cannot say that objects we see thus are idealized; for to idealize is not to lose sight of reality, but to sever what is impure and transient from the lofty and imperishable. Here, however, if the comparison be permissible, we see reality, not enhanced, but transformed. We behold her through an unfamiliar medium of strange and deceptive splendour; and it is in this splendour, glowing as well as soft, that the present poem is steeped."—Ath., No. 2352.

5. The Æneids of Virgil, done into English Verse, Lon., 1875, p. 8vo.

"The breath of poetry informs the whole work; but this must not be held to imply that Mr. Morris has not taken a strict view of his duties as a translator. He has studied the language of Virgil in all its uncommon and original turns with the care of a scholar; the number of lines in each book is, if we mistake not, accurately reproduced; the periods are ended as Virgil ended them, and his unfinished lines never finished. Mr. Morris's metre, the long ballad verse, sets the whole poem, as it were, to a national and popular music."—H. NETTLESHIP: Acad., viii. 493.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"In 'The Earthly Paradise,' though he may claim to be more than the idle singer of an empty day, and to lay ghosts, in truth the author lays no ghosts that haunt the hearts and brains of modern men. Nor is he in any but a superficial sense a disciple of Chaucer. The ride to Canterbury on breezy April mornings to the sound of jingling bells or the miller's bagpipe, under the conduct of jovial Harry Bailly, and in company with a parson who wrought and taught Christ's doctrine, and a ploughman inspired with the hearty benevolence of a Hercules, is all unlike the foiled search of an earthly paradise by weary wanderers. . . . An unheroic melancholy, a barren autumnal sadness, broods over the whole poem. . . . Such poetry (and all the more because it comes from a spirit robust and vigorous in its sympathy with human passion) is in truth the poetry of despair. But since 'The Earthly Paradise' was first imagined Mr. Morris has found a faith. His heartiness of nature would not permit the passion of the reformer to remain dormant within him; his quarrel with the present time is acute; he still dreams indeed of an earthly paradise, but now he sees it afar off in the Socialist millennium. Though we get from Mr. Morris no original verse comparable with that of his earlier volumes, and though we may doubt of his millennium, we cannot but rejoice that he has quitted that strange dreamy western land and stands a singer of hope in the streets of London. . . . Better, far better, 'Chants for Socialists' with faith, however inadequate for the wants of the soul, and hope, and charity, than the 'Earthly Paradise' with all life a melancholy dream."—E. DOWDEN: Transcripts and Studies, p. 230.

"Besides being one of the most delightful poets that ever lived (and also one of the greatest, if we properly consider what gifts went to the writing of 'Sigurd'), he is one of the healthiest, in the sense that an old Viking or an old Greek was healthy who loved life and detested, though he might not fear, death."—Ath., No. 2731.

"The only fault we have to find with Mr. Morse's life, which is thoroughly readable and instructive, is that he has made it too popular, or rather too familiar."—Nation, xxiii. 63.

5. John Quincy Adams, ("American Statesmen,") Bost., 1882, 16mo.

"That Mr. Morse's conclusions will in the main be those of posterity we have very little doubt, and he has set an admirable example to his coadjutors in respect of interesting narrative, just proportion, and judicial candor."—Nation, xxxiv. 301.

6. Thomas Jefferson, ("American Statesmen,") Bost., 1883, 16mo.

"In vigor of style, selection and arrangement of details, and unity of narrative there is little left to be desired. In comparison with the common run of biographies, the subject stands out like a portrait by a master beside a colored photograph."—Nation, xxxvi. 449.

7. John Adams, ("American Statesmen,") Bost., 1884, 16mo.

"Mr. Morse has almost every quality which a biographer needs,—a considerable power of sympathy, a rare facility of expression, combined with good sense, judgment, and discrimination in sifting evidence and using material. On the present occasion he has necessarily followed, in the main, the excellent biography of John Adams . . . by his grandson."—Nation, xl. 37.

Motley, John Lothrop, D.C.L., [ante, vol. ii., add.,] 1814–1877. He was U.S. minister to Austria 1861–67, and to England 1869–70. From 1868 he resided in England, making occasional excursions to the Continent, and a visit to America in 1875. He was elected a corresponding member of the French Institute, Academy of Moral and Political Sciences, in 1860, and a foreign associate in 1876, and received honorary degrees from Oxford, Harvard, and other universities. 1. History of the United Netherlands, from the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce, 1609, Lon. and N. York, 1860–68, 4 vols. 8vo.

"His capital quality is the sustained interest he takes in the men and the deeds he describes. . . . The reader, when he lays down one of his volumes, is sure that he has been with real men and in the heat of real action. . . . He conducts a siege or fights a battle as if he were there. . . . He transfers his readers from topic to topic, from region to region, and from land to sea, by natural and well-varied transitions. . . . Mr. Motley's best style is singularly animated and energetic. . . . He is never at a loss for words, and his words are very often pithy and nervous. But he does not keep his style faithfully up to its best. . . . He can descend to fine, to smart, and to flat writing. . . . Nor is it backed, at least in the regions of reflection, by powerful imagination."—Nation, vi. 170.

"History could scarcely supply a more magnificent subject. It is therefore high praise to say that the historian has, on the whole, not fallen below his theme. Mr. Motley's is not, to our mind, a perfect style of writing. It is tainted, as has been justly observed, with imitations of Macaulay and—still more palpably—of Carlyle. It sometimes strains after an effect which a calm narrative would better attain. Its irony is rather superabundant, and not always in good taste. It speaks when it had better leave events to speak. It is wanting in terseness. . . . It deals in figurative language of a rather uncultivated kind. . . . The whole is not the less a work of the highest merit and of the deepest interest, and a great and permanent addition to historical literature."—Sat. Rev., xi. 122.

"In the part of his work which relates to the religious struggle which ended with the execution of Barneveld, we have Mr. Motley at his best. . . . Unhappily, Mr. Motley has been seized by a desire to leave his proper work in order to write the History of the Thirty Years' War. . . . It is with unfeigned regret that all who value Mr. Motley's work in his own sphere will see that he is despising the difficulties of a subject on which his knowledge is extremely limited."—SAMUEL R. GARDINER, Acad., v. 193.

"We are forced to the conclusion that Mr. Motley, having usefully spent a good deal of time in deciphering Dutch manuscripts, has been tempted to make out of them a much longer work than their importance justifies, and, further, to eke it out by the introduction, from tolerably familiar sources, of a good deal of irrelevant matter. . . . In spite of some brilliant passages in it, he will add nothing to his reputation by this so-called history of 'The Life and Death of John of Barneveld.'"—Ath., No. 2414.

"Mr. Motley . . . would appear qualified beyond most men to write the life of the greatest of Dutch statesmen, and readers who take up his last work will naturally expect to find in it a thoroughly satisfactory life of John of Barneveld. This expectation will be disappointed. The book has great merits. Mr. Motley's industry has collected together a large amount of information, all of which is new to the mass of his readers, and a great deal of which he may be fairly said to have for the first time exhumed or discovered. There are, further, parts of the book . . . which are admirable specimens of animated narrative; but, though the work is filled with materials from which it would be possible to construct a biography of Barneveld, it can hardly claim to be a life of the Advocate. Readers will put down the two volumes with a sense of having read a confused chronicle of perplexed events without being able to form to themselves a clear conception of the course of the narrative, of the character and policy of the man with whom it deals, or of the real causes of his tragic end. The work reads like chapters torn from their places in a longer consecutive history. The chapters are not without interest, but they fail to compose a biography."—A. V. DICEY: Nation, xviii. 300.

"Of eloquence in the ordinary sense of the word there is nothing here. It would be difficult to find a single oratorical sentence from one end of the volume to the other; yet there is scarcely a sermon in it which does not possess

"We can hardly turn over a page of what Mozley has written without meeting with some striking thought, and we are everywhere conscious of the perfect good faith and sincerity which animated him. But we cannot fail also to be reminded not unfrequently of the fact that he generally presented himself as an advocate, though a perfectly sincere advocate, and not as a judge or a philosopher. Hence he not uncommonly states questionable propositions as if they admitted of no question; and in pushing on a vigorous front attack he is not always aware that he has uncovered his flank."—S. He was rector of Cholderton, Wiltshire, 1836–44; resided successively in London and in Finchampstead, Berkshire, till 1868, when he became rector of Plymtree, Devonshire. He was rural dean of Plymtree, then of Ottery St. Mary. In 1880 he resigned his living and settled at Cheltenham. He was for many years on the staff of the London Times. 1. "Though it is not the history of Tractarianism, it is the one book to which, next to and as corrective of the 'Apologia pro Vitâ Suâ,' the future historian of Tractarianism must resort if he does not desire to stumble most wofully."—Sat. Rev., liv. 53, 120.

"Above everything else, there are reminiscences of Cardinal Newman, and they have the charm which everything associated with that mysterious and solitary figure inevitably possesses. In one respect Mr. Mozley is specially qualified to tell the story of the Oxford movement. . . . He regards the Oxford movement with the keenest possible interest, but it is with an interest which is historical and personal, not theological. . . . There is much besides in these volumes that is interesting, and much that is amusing. There are good stories about the Wilberforces, about Archdeacon Denison, about Domford, [? Dornford,] a now forgotten Oriel Fellow of that day, and about others who were associated with the Oxford movement, while for those who care to read them there are some curious chapters describing Mr. Mozley's own theological position."—Spectator, lv. 831.

"Many before now—Oakley, Froude, Kennard, not to mention Newman himself—have contributed to the story of the Tractarian movement. None of these, not even the famous 'Apologia,' will compare with the two volumes now before us in respect of minute fulness, close personal observation, and characteristic touches."—Mark Pattison: Acad., xxii. 1.

3. Reminiscences, chiefly of Towns, Villages, and Schools, Lon., 1885, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The earlier book appealed to general curiosity by the revelations which it offered of the inner lives of men whose names and fame belong to the world. . . . The later publication invites our sympathetic interest by the lengthy and self-satisfied particularity with which it lingers over and plays with the characters and fortunes of obscure and stupid persons. This would promise a dull book in the hands of a matter-of-fact chronicler; but with Mr. Mozley the individual is always made the type of the class, and the class is used to represent the age."—Sat. Rev., lix. 622.

"We fear that, emboldened by the success of his former book, Mr. Mozley has raked together the contents of his diaries and note-books and connected them by threads out of his own memory. Whatever the process has been, the result is a work of which Mrs. Nickleby, if she had had the vestige of a literary gift, might well claim the authorship."—Spectator, lviii. 391.

"No one will be disappointed who seeks in them a faithful and graphic picture of a past of which the traces are rapidly vanishing away."—Acad., xxvii. 107.

Mueller, Friedrich Max, Ph.D., M.A., [ante, vol. ii., MULLER, MAX, add.,] became a Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford, and assistant at the Bodleian Library in 1856, and sub-librarian in 1865. He retained his chair of modern languages till 1868, when a new professorship of comparative philology was specially created for him. In 1875 he practically resigned his chair, Prof. Sayce being appointed deputy professor, and devoted himself to editing the first series of Sacred Books of the East. In 1873 he delivered a lecture on missions in Westminster Abbey, at the request of Dean Stanley, and in 1878 he delivered the first course of the Hibbert Lectures. He is a foreign member of the French Institute, and has received the order of Merit from the King of Prussia. He has contributed largely to the leading English reviews. 1. A German Reading-Book, containing Extracts arranged Chronologically: with Biographical Notices, Translations, and Notes: Part I., Early: Fourth to Fifteenth Centuries; Part II., Modern: Sixteenth to Nineteenth Centuries, Lon., 1858, 2 vols. 8vo. 2. A History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature so far as it illustrates the Primitive Religion of the Brahmans, Lon., 1859, 8vo; 2d ed., 1860. 3. Lectures on the Science of Language, delivered at the Royal Institution of Great Britain, Lon., 1861–64, 2 series, 8vo; 6th ed., 1871; new eds., 1875, 1880, 1882.

"We must not conclude without expressing our admiration for the work as a whole, the herculean massiveness of its learning,—comprehending not merely a profound knowledge of many languages, and a wonderful command of our own tongue for a foreigner, but a familiarity with various branches of science,—the bold originality and general soundness of its philosophy, and the transparency, animation, and occasional eloquence of its style, by which a subject so abstruse has been rendered not merely intelligible but attractive to a popular audience and the general reader."—Ath., No. 1919.

4. A Sanskrit Grammar for Beginners, (Hand-Books for the Study of Sanskrit,) Lon., 1866, 8vo; 2d ed., in Devanâgarî and Roman Letters throughout, revised and accentuated, 1870, r. 8vo; new ed, abridged, with a Chapter on Syntax and an Appendix on Classical Metres, by A. A. Macdonell, 1886, 8vo. 5. Chips from a German Workshop, Lon., 1867–75, 4 vols. 8vo; new ed., 1880: vol. i., Essays on the Science of Religion; vol. ii., Essays on Mythology, Tradition, and Customs; vol. iii., Essays on Literature, Biography, and Antiquities; vol. iv., Essays on the Science of Language.

"In going through these volumes, we are set thinking about a vast number of subjects, but we are fully satisfied with none. We come to the end of each paper with a very distinct feeling of asking for more. . . . There is in his treatment a remarkable union of earnestness with tolerance. . . . Prof. Müller is really one of the best English writers of the day. He employs our language not only with ease and vigour, but with conspicuous purity and good taste."—Sat. Rev., xxv. 93, 146.

Introduction to the Science of Religion: Four Lectures delivered at the Royal Institution: with Two Essays on False Analogies and the Philosophy of Mythology, Lon., 1873, p. 8vo.

"The first of its six lectures begins by pleading in favour of 'A Science of Religion.' . . . The second lecture gives a kind of sketch-map of the religions of the world. . . . The third lecture begins with the connection between language and religion, arguing that 'the classification of languages is applicable to the ancient religions of the world.' . . . The fourth lecture is devoted to 'the right spirit in which ancient religions ought to be studied and interpreted.' . . . From first to last Prof. Max Müller's book is full of such instruction as educates in the highest sense of the word."—Ath., No. 2380.

12. On Missions: a Lecture delivered in Westminster Abbey on December 3, 1873: with an Introductory Sermon by Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, D.D., Dean of Westminster, Lon., 1873, 8vo. 13. Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion, as illustrated by the Religions of India, (Hibbert Lectures,) Lon., 1878, 8vo; new ed., 1879.

"We must confess that Prof. Max Müller's arguments do not carry us with them,—that they raise more questions than they settle, and leave the 'Origin of Religion' still unexplained. Their value as a popular exposition of the views of one of the most learned, accomplished, and genial of modern scholars has been and will be widely, not to say universally, acknowledged."—*Sat. "The reader can only appreciate the power and the art of the lecturer if at the end of the concluding lecture he pauses to think how much he has learnt, and yet in how short a space the teaching has been embodied, with what lucidity and pleasantness it has been conveyed, and how just a proportion has been preserved between the parts."—Sat. Rev., lv. 183.

"He does not touch on the political lessons taught by a hundred years of empire, nor on those industrial, moral, and æsthetic lessons eloquently and ingeniously deduced by Sir George Birdwood from certain phases of Indian social life. The teaching Prof. Max Müller refers to is that which may be derived, on a broad view of the matter, from a study of the ancient language and literature of India."—Ath., No. 2886.

20. Biographical Essays, Lon., 1884, cr. 8vo.

"All the essays are connected by the common tastes and aspirations of men who were either Orientals or Orientalists, or interested in the theory or practice of religion. . . . Like all Mr. Müller's writings, this volume of biographical sketches will be read with almost equal pleasure by his followers and by those who cannot follow him complacently nor to all lengths."—Sat. Rev., lviii. 575.

21. The Science of Thought, Lon., 1887, 8vo.

"The topics dealt with in this work may be roughly distributed under five headings. We have (i.) a disquisition on the connection between thought and language; (ii.) a polemic against the Darwinian theory, at least as understood by its extreme partisans; (iii.) an exposition and defence of Kant's theory of knowledge; (iv.) an inquiry, filling more than half the volume, into the composition, origin, and growth of language; (v.) an application of the results obtained to certain logical questions at issue between J. S. Mill and his opponents. . . . To explain the origin of language, Prof. Max Müller adopts the theory of his friend—who seems also to be his guide and philosopher—Prof. Ludwig Noiré. . . . The professor is at his best when he most thoroughly accepts the doctrine of evolution."—ALFRED W. BENN: Acad., xxxi. 317.

"The essays will be found to be uniformly marked by all the professor's well-known characteristics of thought and method. From small beginnings, or what seem to be such, the reader is led by very easy stages to momentous conclusions. His passage through the centuries of phonetic growth and decay is smoothed by the ripe experience and enlivened, though only occasionally, by the restrained and academical humour of his guide. . . . In the two concluding essays of the series Prof. Max Müller sums up, as it were, his case in the matter of the original home and earliest civilization of the Aryas. He reverts to the position which he took up and defended forty years ago. His formula, he declares, is as valid as ever, for the Aryas came not from somewhere in Europe,—as Schrader and Penka have said in their heart,—but from 'somewhere in Asia.'" —Ath., No. 3148.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"Prof. Max Müller is always fascinating, always instructive; the dry bones of science clothe themselves with flesh and beauty under his touch, and we go to him not merely to be taught the laws of human speech and mythology, but to learn also our own tongue, and to discover how the hand of the master can throw a charm over the labours of the student and a flood of light over his darkest problems."—A. H. SAYCE: Acad., viii. 507.

Muhlenberg, William Augustus, D.D., S.T.D., [ante, vol. ii., add.,] 1796–1877; became rector of the Church of the Holy Communion in 1846. He founded St. Luke's Hospital, opened in 1859, and was its pastor and superintendent till his death. In 1852 he organized the first Protestant Sisterhood in the United States. In 1866 he started St. Johnland, an industrial Christian settlement, on Long Island, about forty-five miles from New York. He also originated the Memorial movement in the Protestant Episcopal Church, and wrote much on evangelical union, of which he was an earnest advocate. "Sir W. Muir may not be said to have added many new facts to those already so diligently collected by Professor Weil in his 'Geschichte der Chalifen;' but for English readers he has certainly written an interesting volume on the times when new phases of development succeeded each other with such marvellous rapidity in the body politic of Islam."—*Sat. "This book fills a place not hitherto occupied in English literature, and fills it worthily. The active researches and speculations of the German historical school of Roman law have put a new face on the early history, as well as on the later history, of the private law of Rome. Prof. Muirhead has a singularly complete familiarity with recent competent writers, whether German, French, or Italian. . . . But he has also an independent mastery of his subject, and a faculty for clear and sensible exposition, which are by no means always the accompaniments of scholarship and learning."—H. J. "With a great deal of learning and much substantial excellence, the work is not likely to secure many readers or much solid praise. . . . It is an honest effort to find a basis for political science outside of the mere dry letter of the law; to establish the right of our government on some broader and firmer foundation than the well-worn text of the Constitution; to show the ethical and moral significance of the important political problem in course of being solved by the growth and prosperity of the United States, and of the great commonwealths within it."—Nation, xi. 10.

2. The Republic of God: an Institute of Theology, Bost., 1881, 8vo.

"The main feature of Dr. Mulford's theology, as presented in his 'Republic of God,' is the union of the utmost liberty of philosophic thought with Christian dogmas. He urges the personality of God as the central principle of the universe, but in a form so comprehensive and elevated as to seem no longer incompatible with that conception of Deity to which modern thought is approximating, of an infinite energy diffused throughout the universe, from whom all things proceed, and in whom they consist. . . . Revelation is the manifestation of the Divine personality in history, finding its highest and absolute expression in Christ. . . . The Bible witnesses to a revelation, but is not the revelation: sacraments witness to a divine process of purification and feeding, but are not themselves the process; the church bears witness to a life of the spirit in humanity, which goes beyond its boundaries as an organization."—A. Murfree, Miss Mary Noailles, ("Charles Egbert Craddock," pseud.,) b. about 1850, at Grantlands, near Murfreesborough, Tenn., a town named for her ancestor, Col. Hardy Murfree, an officer in the Revolutionary army. The family resided for some time in Nashville, but having lost property in the civil war they returned to Grantlands, and afterwards settled in St. Louis, Mo. Miss Murfree became lame at an early age from a stroke of paralysis, and being debarred from active occupations sought companionship in books. She attracted attention by her stories of Tennessee mountain life contributed to the Atlantic Monthly under the above pseudonyme before 1880. 1. In the Tennessee Mountains. By Charles Egbert Craddock. Bost., 1884, 12mo.

"He needed to tell but one story to prove his power as a simple narrator. . . . But the eight stories now grouped together . . . present in their total effect much more than mere short stories. We have not only one mountain valley, but a whole country of hills,—not a man and a woman here and there, but the people of a whole district,—not merely a day of winter or of summer, but all the year,—not lives, but life. Mr. Craddock is a master in the art of description. . . . It is hardly needful to add that the style is admirable, with marked characteristics of its own which extend beyond the mere expression, and produce at times an effect of rhythm, not of words, but of thought."—Nation, xxxviii. 449.

2. Where the Battle was Fought, Bost., 1884, 12mo.

"Picture follows picture and incident hurries after incident so quickly that the reader himself hastens on to the dénouement without clearly separating the characters that pass before him. It is only upon a review that he will realize how rich and varied a material can be found in a dull, deserted country neighborhood by an imagination keen in detecting the poetic value of inanimate things. It must be owned that the story is handled rather as a series of sketches. . . . Taken apart from any plot or narrative, the book presents a picture of the condition of the country desolated by the war, as it seemed six years after the peace, such as we have never had before."—Nation, xxxix. 313.

3. Down the Ravine, Bost., 1885, 12mo.

"The tale has all the quick and varied perception, the glow of imagination, which gave charm to the earlier sketches. It shows also a constructive power which, naturally, they gave no opportunity to display."—Nation, xl. 157.

4. The Prophet of the Great Smoky Mountain, Bost., 1885, 12mo.

"Like 'In the Tennessee Mountains.' it is a picture of manners, using the word in that large sense which includes all the complicated relations of things, animate and inanimate, that make up the circumstance of life. It has the same strongly etched outline and the same vivid color. . . . If the Prophet were really her subject, she has done her own original conception scant justice. She has deserted it to give us instead separate pictures (all strong, we admit) of detached groups."—Nation, xli. 428.

Strongly-coloured views no doubt interfere with the value of the book regarded as a source of authoritative opinion. "Few modern novelists can tell a story of English country life better than Mr. D. Christie Murray. He has the minute observation of manners and speech, the patient accuracy of detail, the sustained attention to minor points without which no such story can be built to the satisfaction of the reader. But it is something better than a mere novel; the treatment is as original as the subject. . . . The interest never flags, and incidents simple and natural in themselves never run to monotony. . . . The story embraces a picture of the Paris of the day, taken in its political and social aspects."—Sat. Rev., xxxii. 344.

A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles: founded mainly on the Materials collected by the Philological Society. Part I. Oxf., 1884, imp. 4to. (This work originated in a paper "On the Deficiencies in our English Dictionaries" read to the Philological Society by Archbishop Trench in November, 1857. The plan was fully arranged in August, 1858, but the premature death of its superintendent, Herbert Coleridge, caused it to languish until 1879, when it was taken up by the director of the society, Dr. Murray.)

"The main points in which this work is immensely superior to all English dictionaries, and better even than M. Littré's splendid dictionary of the French language, are these. The history of living words is traced up from their earliest appearance by means of dated quotations, and all obsolete words which have died out since 1125 are similarly treated. The orthographic and phonetic development of words is indicated and illustrated in the quotations by the retention of old spelling. The definitions of the meanings, as we are told in the 'General Explanations,' (p. xi.) 'have been framed anew upon a study of all the quotations for each word collected for this work, of which those printed form only a small part;' so that in this, 'the most successfully cultivated department of English lexicography,' a notable advance has been made. In the exposition and exemplification of the historical and logical order of the different senses of words which have had or have still more than one meaning all previous efforts are far surpassed. . . . A large number of obsolete words belonging to the period which other dictionaries profess to embrace are here recorded for the first time. . . . Numbers of new forms also make their lexicographic début."—Ath., No. 2937.

"It is by this time abundantly clear that the 'New English Dictionary' is marking an enormous advance in the philological knowledge of the English language, of which advance by far the larger portion must be attributed directly to the contents of the said 'Dictionary.'"—Ath., No. 3180.

"This Dictionary will itself be the greatest monument of English philological criticism ever constructed."—Sat. Rev., lxiii. 775.

"The Philological Society has been especially fortunate in finding an editor with so judicial a turn of mind,—one who weighs the evidence, and goes by it, instead of importing into words something evolved out of his own consciousness. The breadth and accuracy of the results thus obtained are most satisfactory."—W. W. SKEAT: Acad., xxxi. 247.

"In the early days of his ministry he became acquainted with many of the Revolutionary celebrities, both military and civil. From such an experience he has woven the present work, without much attention to form or sequence, and with a certain not unpleasant naïveté."—Nation, xxxvii. 148.

Myers, Rev. Frederic, M.A., [ante, vol. ii., MYERS, F., both entries, add.,] d. 1851; graduated at Cambridge 1833; Fellow of Clare Hall 1833–39; perpetual curate of St. John's, Keswick, from 1839. 1. Catholic Thoughts on the Church of Christ and the Church of England, ("Present-Day Papers,") Lon., 1874, 12mo; new ed., 1883. Posth. (This volume contains two out of the four books of which the work consists. "Catholic Thoughts" was printed for private circulation in 1841.)

"For all who care to know what an eminently wise and good man thought concerning the ideal relation of Church and State, the baseless fabric of Apostolical Succession, the metaphysical impossibility of legitimate authority in the sphere of spiritual truth, . . . and concerning the future of the Church, to be united, not in the acceptance of any dogmatic system, but by the love of Christ and Christ-like lives, the 'Catholic Thoughts' will become a valued and permanent possession."—Spectator, xlvii. 80.

2. Catholic Thoughts on the Bible and Theology, ("Present-Day Papers,") Lon., 1874, 12mo; new ed., 1878.

"The author's teaching on the relation of the Bible to Christianity and Hebrew Monotheism is even more suggestive and more valuable than his conclusions, profound as these are, on the relation of the Church to the individual Christian."—Spectator, xlvii. 1035.

Myers, Frederic William Henry, b. 1843, at Keswick; son of Rev. F. Myers, supra. 1. Saint Paul, Lon., 1867, 12mo; new ed., 1879.

"This poem, though written in stanzas, is in its essence dramatic. From first to last it is a pure soliloquy, in which St. Paul is made to express his sense of his own unworthiness, his deep repentance, and his attitude of devotion and faith towards his Master. . . . Into St. Paul's character, however, into his motives, and into his various mental transitions, Mr. Myers has not sought to enter. He simply presents us with a record of emotions. . . . These are sometimes expressed with no common power of music and of diction."—Ath., No. 2105.

2. Poems, Lon., 1870, 12mo. 3. Wordsworth, ("English Men of Letters,") Lon., 1880, p. 8vo.

"Mr. Myers, assisted by some valuable unpublished documents submitted to him by friends of his own and of Wordsworth's, has given an excellent account of the poet's life, such as it was, and a running commentary on his principal works."—Sat. Rev., li. 214.

4. The Renewal of Youth, and other Poems, Lon., 1882, p. 8vo.

"Many of the poems are enigmatical, not to say mystical, in utterance, they are cultivated and refined in style, and the most important are deeply charged with that burden of sadness which is a very marked characteristic of the age. The highest gifts of poetry they can scarcely claim. Nothing that can be called imaginative or creative, and little that is in any full sense dramatic, appears in Mr. Myers's pages. The poems have, however, marked felicity of thought and expression; the illustrations employed are appropriate; the style, though elaborate and ornate, is poetical; and the whole entitles its author to a place with those whose statues are in the portico of the House of Fame."—Ath., No. 2885.

5. Essays: Classical, Lon., 1883, p. 8vo. 6. Essays: Modern, Lon., 1883, p. 8vo.

"Throughout the volumes the reader feels that, whether he agrees with the writer's critical judgment or not, they are the independent judgments of a man whose knowledge is always first-hand, and whose power of creating ideas is above rather than below his power of expressing them."—Ath., No. 2906.

"His [Napier's] letters have not been preserved, or at any rate have not been collected; but the familiar outpourings of the habitual writers in the 'Review,' with occasional letters from less frequent contributors, remained with Mr. Napier, and a selection from this correspondence has now been published by his son. . . . It must be owned that most readers will find that the chief amusement they derive from these miscellaneous letters consists in the very free criticisms which some of the writers bestowed on the articles appearing in successive numbers of the 'Edinburgh.'"—*Sat. "To the surviving few who recollect the earlier years of the 'Review' . . . it will require no recommendation beyond its title; to the present generation it will be interesting by affording a glimpse behind the curtain of scenes to which some have heard enthusiastic allusions in the talk of their seniors, and a nearer personal view of some of the giants of the early part of this century than is perhaps to be found even in the well-written biographies of many of them which have appeared."—Spectator, lii. 1162.

"In giving this account of his religious history, Dr. Newman is thoroughly and implicitly to be believed. There is the stamp of truth in every word he utters about himself. The lofty egotism, inseparable, perhaps, from the occasion, the severe and cautious analysis of motive, the artistic power with which he anatomizes himself and lays bare his own palpitating nerves, and the exquisitely painful pleasure with which he seriously studies his inmost soul, and asks others into the dissecting-room where he lectures on himself, has both dignity and pathos in it."—*Sat. "The volume naturally divides into three portions. The first part consists of various short compositions, chiefly reprints from the 'Lyra Apostolica.' . . . Then follows a series of translations from the hymns of the Breviary. . . . And lastly we have what is the longest and apparently the latest poem in the book, the 'Dream of Gerontius.' . . . There is no previous work of Dr. Newman's, except the 'Apologia,' so rich in personal indications."—Sat. Rev., xxv. 144.

9. Parochial and Plain Sermons. Edited by W. J. Copeland, B.D. Lon., 1868, 8 vols. (This includes the Parochial Sermons previously published, with others.)

10. An Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent, Lon., 1870, p. 8vo; 4th ed., 1874; new ed., 1885.

"His recent book will leave him as it found him, a comparatively isolated thinker. . . . He approaches Custom, Authority, Tradition, Dogma, not from the objective but from the subjective side."—Sat. Rev., xxix. 515.

"Men are, or think they are, (for it is the same thing,) certain of great portions of their knowledge. What are the criteria of this certainty? When do we know that our assent has been rightly given to any preference? This is the logical problem to which the 'Grammar of Assent' is addressed. . . . The sources of interest opened by this volume are of two kinds. (1) The personal interest, which here rises to the level of history. For the mental analysis presented is not only an analysis of the mind of the author, it is an analysis of a whole phase of religious thought,—a phase which will hereafter form the principal topic of the ecclesiastical history of the nineteenth century. . . . (2) The second source of interest is derived from the scientific value of the logical view propounded. . . . This theory of Assent is . . . nothing more than an account of a fact. It offers no criterion of truth."—MARK PATTISON: Acad., i. 229.

"These essays of Dr. Newman's were almost all of them written and published while he was still a Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, and a member of the Established Church, . . . Few as there are of these essays which do not contain thoughts and suggestions much wider and deeper than any peculiar to the Anglican creed from the point of which they were written, . . . their value will be diminished to the ordinary reader by the fact that as an Anglican Dr. Newman necessarily took a much narrower view of the issues between doubt and faith than he has taken since he entered the Catholic Church."—Spectator, xliv. 1371.

13. Historical Sketches, Lon., 1872, 2 vols. cr. 8vo.

"They are comparatively light, both in substance and method, not professing to be the result of any very profound research, and not possessing, apart from the clearness with which they bring out the author's view of particular periods, an historical value of the highest kind."—*Sat. 14. A Letter addressed to His Grace the Duke of Norfolk on Occasion of Mr. Gladstone's Recent Expostulation, Lon., 1875, 8vo; 4th ed. same year.

"The scenes and incidents which have been retrenched are quite inadmissible, and we may cheerfully accept an ingenious and blameless substitute for them."—Spectator, liii. 1043.

Some of the books included in the foregoing list, such as the Historical Sketches, &c., belong to a collected edition of Cardinal Newman's writings, Lon., 1870–79, 36 vols.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"There is something in Dr. Newman's manner of even approaching a subject characteristic of the peculiarities of his mind. He seems to labour under a kind of intellectual squint. Partly from nature and partly from inveterate habit, he seems incapable of taking a straightforward view of anything. The mind's eye glances off at once from a direct survey to the sides of whatever he contemplates, and, losing sight of all that is most obvious to others, lights on some collateral bearing, some chance relation to accidental circumstance, and fastens there. The sinister power of discovering, and readiness to seize, the wrong handle of everything is, curiously enough, what gives him with many his great reputation for depth of thought; just as if a man should gain the character of a great navigator by going from this [Dublin] to Holyhead by the Cape of Good Hope instead of taking the direct course."—RIGHT REV. WILLIAM FITZGERALD: Lectures on Ecclesiastical History.

"The one object to which he has devoted the labours of a lifetime has been the formation of his religious creed. He has exercised an influence more powerful over the thoughts of his generation on such subjects than almost any other living man. He is regarded by many people as an incarnation of what is called 'remorseless logic;' and yet, after careful and prolonged study of all his principal writings, we find it impossible to understand what is the foundation of his whole structure. . . . From first to last he never, so far as we know, gives any clear account of the reasons why he should hold with this desperate tenacity to the opinions which appear to lead to results which appear so strange. The question forces itself on a reader of the 'Apologia' at every page of that work, but it contains almost nothing to gratify his curiosity."—Sat. Rev., xix. 768.

"His was not the writer's nature that is irresistibly impelled to writing and thinking for their own sakes. He thought, he wrote, that he might influence the actions of men. He did influence their actions, but, as a consequence, most of what he wrote has in reality died away with its practical effect, and of his forty volumes but a few sermons, 'Lead, kindly Light,'—the one hymn of our language,—the 'Apologia,' and perhaps 'The Idea of a University,' will form permanent additions to English literature. His histories are unhistorical, his criticism uncritical, and much of his theology is founded on his history and criticism. . . . And yet what literary powers were those that thus seem to have been squandered away on temporary objects! . . . All the resources of a master of English style—except, perhaps, one, description—were at his command; pure diction, clear arrangement, irony, dignity, a copious command of words combined with a reserve in the use of them,—all these qualities went to make up the charm of Newman's style, the finest flower that the earlier system of a purely classical education has produced."—Ath., No. 3277.

"There is no lack of liberality of imaginative receptiveness in a critic who can speak with admiration, often warming into enthusiasm, of such widely differing poets as Chatterton, Byron, Shelley, Wordsworth, Keats, Hugo, Tennyson, and Whitman. . . . Mr. Noel devotes himself less to abstract scientific appraisement than to what we may describe as an intellectual vindication of emotional preferences."—Spectator, lix. 755.

"A book which insists on being read with care, and well repays it; for Mr. Noel writes about poets with the insight of a fellow-craftsman, and would be well worth listening to even if he did not say what he does say admirably."—Acad., xxix. 503.

9. A Modern Faust, and other Poems, Lon., 1888, p. 8vo.

"It is at once the most intelligible and the deepest of Mr. Roden Noel's poems, the purest in style, the widest in scope, the ripest in artistic execution, and the maturest in expression of its author's views."—J. A. SYMONDS: Acad., xxxv. 33.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"The Hon. Roden Noel, as a poet, has never received the attention he deserves. This is not altogether the fault of the English public. Mr. Noel's poems are not exactly such as he who runs may read. To be appreciated they require patient study, not only because their thought is often abstruse, but also because their expression is not unfrequently perplexing. Indeed, no other poet of our age, with the exception of Mr. Robert Browning, has added so much of verbal and rhythmical difficulty to the difficulties of pregnant meaning and bold speculation. . . . It is probable that his poems will not receive due recognition until a Noel Society has been founded. Then people will discover that an impassioned singer, a philosopher of marked originality, a tender-hearted Christian, and a democrat in the noblest sense of that term, has been appealing to them in words of wayward beauty and varied melody during more than a quarter of a century, almost unheeded."—JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS: Acad., xxxv. 33.

"Certainly these volumes form a faithful analysis of all the chronicles bearing on the period; and when we consider the sheer bulk of the materials, it is not surprising that the work should have needed, as Miss Norgate intimates, the labour of eleven years. . . . Not only does Miss Norgate present us with no new views, but she passionately rejects the humblest offers of new lights. We thus get, as regards the main subject, the old story, though we are bound to say that here and there occur clever solutions of isolated difficulties. . . . Her volumes will form a necessary part of every historical library."—RICHARD HOWLETT: Acad., xxxii. 312.

"Her book is emphatically scholarly; she has a clear sight and a strong grasp of things, and she is not carried away by fancies. . . . She is always at her very best in Anjou and the other lands of the counts of Anjou; she is not, as a rule, at her very best in England, neither is she at her very best in Aquitaine. . . . Her treatment of Anjou and the Angevins is all alive; in Aquitaine it gets comparatively cold and dead."—E. A. FREEMAN: Historical Review, No. 8.

His main purpose, however, is to . . . urge the danger which the conduct and present temper of the French bode to England and to civilization generally. Norris, William Edward, b. 1847, in London; son of the late Sir William Norris, chief justice of Ceylon; educated at Eton; called to the bar at the Inner Temple 1874, but never practised. Most of his novels were first published as serials in the Cornhill, Temple Bar, and other magazines. He resides at Torquay. 1. Heaps of Money, Lon., 1877, 2 vols. p. 8vo. 2. Mademoiselle de Mersac, Lon., 1880, 3 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1883. 3. Matrimony, Lon., 1881, 3 vols. cr. 8vo; new ed., 1883.

"'Matrimony' has almost all the qualities that make a good novel,—that is, a good man's novel. We have not at all the same confidence in recommending the book to ladies. Mr. Norris is a student of Thackeray, whose works ladies, as a rule, dislike. . . . Mr. Norris has even adopted a part of Thackeray's method, and here we begin to find fault. It is not everybody who can employ that method. . . . The book is wonderfully rich in types of character. Even the young heroes have an individuality of their own which is rare. . . . Mr. Norris is at home in many varieties of life: his Frenchmen, men of letters, gamblers, and scoundrels, his barbarous Russian general, are almost as good as his rowdy, ill-tempered young lords and gossiping admirals and prosy Spencerian philosopher."—Sat. Rev., li. 277.

4. No New Thing, Lon., 1883, 3 vols. cr. 8vo; new ed., 1884.

"He has written a good novel, as novels go, with some life-like description in it, and much entertaining dialogue, and one or two life-like side characters, . . . and among them all he has placed Tito—Philip Marescalchi—and so guided him that the reader, even if he has absorbed 'Romola,' feels no sense of failure in the portrait. . . . Mr. Norris has the art of analyzing character in a high degree, and, after all, that is the novelist's first need. 'No New Thing' is full of very human people, of whom only one is certainly a caricature."—Spectator, lvi. 614.

General Criticism:

"It is a considerable pleasure, in these days of over-refinement and subtle delicacy, to find a new novelist who looks at the world simply from a man of the world's point of view, and does not care to conceal the fact. He 'knows his world,' which is a pretty extensive one, and includes among its inhabitants not only English people of all classes and conditions, but a considerable variety of Continental types as well; and, above all, he has a knowledge of the human heart and a capacity for analyzing its processes which is, to say the least, of great utility to a writer of fiction."—Nation, xxxiii. 138.

"His presentment of life is veracious and sober, his environment is clearly, often brilliantly, delineated, his characters are persuasively human and unheroic."—Sat. Rev., lxii. 524.

"Mr. O'Connor writes from a hostile point of view; but what makes his book so damaging is the array of facts which he marshals along the line of his narrative. . . . Mr. Hitchman's two portly volumes are evidently, though not avowedly, intended to parry Mr. O'Connor's assault. . . . But what Mr. Hitchman has done, after surveying the whole field of facts, is to decline altogether a direct encounter with Mr. O'Connor."—Spectator, lii. 1347.

"Mr. T. P. O'Connor proves again, if any further proof was wanted, that we have in very many cases allowed the Irish landlords to use the rights of property possessed by them to an extent revolting to humanity and destructive to a sound social and political fabric of society. We venture to deny, however, that he proves the next and necessary contention,—namely, that the remedy is Home-rule."—Spectator, lix. 614.

"Free from the besetting faults of most native historians, from their easily explicable want of perspective, their lingering over more or less mythical glories which have nothing to do with progress, he is, above all, severely impartial. Whosoever they are,—whether 'Milesians' or Danes, adventurers of Elizabeth or of Cromwell, Orange-men or recreant Catholic lords, or absentee rent-drawers, who have made the people their prey; under whatever pretext, religious, social, political, they have cloaked their oppression,—them does his soul abhor."—H. "We fear that this work of Prof. O'Curry will be criticised more severely than it deserves. He understood the Gaedhelic, or ancient language of Ireland, as well as, if not better than, any man of this century; but of general history, philology, or antiquities, he appears to have possessed no knowledge, save what he picked up from the Irish MSS. themselves. Hence, statements of singular naïveté occurring not unfrequently in these Lectures tend to cast an air of ridicule over facts and documents which are of real historical value."—Ath., No. 2413.

Oliphant, Laurence, [ante, vol. ii., add.,] 1829–1888, b. at the Cape of Good Hope; spent some time in Ceylon as private secretary to his father, Sir Anthony Oliphant, who was chief justice there; was called to the bar, but devoted his energies largely to travel; served on Lord Elgin's mission to China 1857–59, and in 1861 was appointed chargé d'affaires at Yedo, where he was attacked by assassins and so severely wounded that he was obliged to resign the appointment. He was member of Parliament for the Stirling Burghs 1865–68, when he resigned his seat, and, having some time previously come under the influence of Thomas Lake Harris, supra, removed to the United States to join the spiritualistic community established in Dutchess Co., N.Y., accompanied by his mother, Lady Oliphant, who shared his views. He handed over his fortune to the community and lived there for about eighteen months, working on the farm and as peddler and teamster. In 1870 he went as correspondent of the London Times to the Franco-Prussian war, and some years later, after an unsuccessful attempt to establish a colony of Jews in Palestine, he founded three religious colonies in that country, at one of which, near the town of Haifa, he took up his residence. In 1888 he made a visit to the United States, and on his return was taken ill and died a few months later. 1. "Mr. Laurence Oliphant undertook his journey with the object of ascertaining how far, and under what conditions, the country east of the Jordan would be available for purposes of colonization, and for the furtherance of his great scheme of Jewish immigration and settlement. . . . If this ambitious and attractive proposal comes to anything, books, and many books, therefore reviews, will be written upon it. . . . "The book is an attempt to expand the high-class, scientific-philosophical-ducal and nethermost West-End-society sketch into a novel. . . . Mr. Oliphant may know, but he cannot describe. His London society, as we gather it from his hazy fragments, is a society which cannot be, for it is a house divided against itself."—Acad., xxiv. 240.

It is fortunate for the world and for his own fame that this modern Tyrtæus has the skill to write eloquently and the grace to write modestly of the deeds and dangers he performed and encountered so gallantly. . . . The book bristles with adventures on every stage."—Sat. Rev., lxiv. 235.

"By an obvious law of its evolutionary progress physical science has of late years passed into the region of the infinitesimally minute. . . . It is a field in which Mr. Oliphant's imagination runs riot to an excess which I at least have never seen surpassed. . . . He explores the world of spirits with a self-assurance which no materialist investigating the laws of matter could possibly rival."—JOHN OWEN: Acad., xxxiv. 81.

"When Mr. Laurence Oliphant tells us that an atomic union has taken place between the inmost principle of his spiritual life and that of other beings no longer living on this side of the grave, and that it is by virtue of such atomic interlockings that the great redeeming force is to be constituted by which the victory over the growing evils of the world is to be gained, what can we say, except that we are very glad to hear that such active preparations for the coming conflict are going on, but that, as they rest on evidence for the existence of which we have only his own word, without anything to confirm it in the range of our own experience, we are not able to exult with any of the confidence which betrays itself in his language? . . . We may add that a great deal of Mr. Oliphant's criticism on the limitations of the inspired writings is very clear and just."—Spectator, lxi. 787.

Oliphant, Mrs. Margaret Oliphant, (Wilson,) [ante, vol. ii., add.,] b. 1828, at Wallyford, near Musselburgh, Midlothian, Scotland; has resided for many years at Windsor. Her first novel, Passages in the Life of Mrs. Margaret Maitland, was published in 1849,—not 1856, as stated ante, vol. ii. During the forty years of her literary life scarcely a year has passed without the publication of a book from her pen, and in some years there have been more than one. Some of them, including most of the earlier and several of the later ones, were first published anonymously. Twelve are mentioned ante, vol. ii. Life of Edward Irving, Edin. and Lon., 1862, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., rev., same year; new eds., 1864, 1865.

"Her book is far too long; her style is far too wordy; and she follows far too readily, and with a fatal facility, in the wake of the modern sensation-biographers. . . . Nevertheless, it cannot be merely from the nature of her subject that she has been enabled to produce a truly interesting and most affecting memoir. The book is written with a genuine enthusiasm that redeems its affectations. The great service she has done to the object of her admiration is in producing more than one series of his letters to his wife, which must forever place his thorough earnestness and simplicity beyond cavil. . . . With the materials now set before us, Irving's life ought to have a niche in every gallery of religious biography; and, notwithstanding all his defects and errors, there are few lives of the saints that will be fuller of instruction, interest, and contemplation."—Sat. Rev., xiii. 658.

11. Chronicles of Carlingford: Salem Chapel, Edin. and Lon., 1863, 2 vols. p. 8vo. Anon.

"Rumour—we do not know how correctly—attributes this remarkable work to the pen of the authoress of the 'Life of Irving.' At any rate, this story, full of grace and originality, has many of the same merits that characterized the biography. There is also a general resemblance between the career of the hero and that of Irving, which can scarcely be accidental. The pictures of the minister and his friends . . . are so vivid, and sketched with so much humour, and so keen a sense both of the ludicrous and the pathetic, that the early part of the story, at least, might be considered quite worthy of the authoress of 'Adam Bede.' . . . There is throughout the book the same delicacy, refinement, and facility of expression which lent so great a charm to the 'Life of Irving.' There is, too, the same spirit of justice and toleration."—Sat. Rev., xv. 210.

They take us into a world of their own, where we are in a common English country town, among common people, . . . and all is probable and consistent, and yet all is new."—Sat. Rev., xv. 794.

The Minister's Wife, Lon., 1869, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"A story which, like the country it describes, is rich in pictures that are pleasant to see, scenes on which the eye gladly lingers, and which, like the people it portrays, is subtle in its reasonings and shrewd and cunning in its opinions, eloquent in its outburst of feeling, very tender in its natural and unstrained pathos, and genuinely, though somewhat grimly, humorous in its unfrequent and subdued jocosity."—*Sat. 22. Historical Sketches of the Reign of George the Second, Edin. and Lon., 1869, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 3d ed., 1875. (Contains twelve biographical sketches, including such characters as Queen Caroline, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, Lord Chesterfield, &c.)

"Her book is a thorough woman's book, feminine in its merits and its defects, and the former far outbalance the latter. . . . Her mode of treatment makes her sometimes extravagant and sometimes unfair, but always readable."—Sat. Rev., xxviii. 709.

"Few, if any, of St. Francis's many biographers, Catholic or Protestant, have told the exquisite tale of his life and work with more quiet grace and appreciative sympathy."—Sat. Rev., xxxi. 740.

"Picturesque the volume eminently is, throughout all its pages. The scenery, the costume, the local colour, are invariably seized by the author, and artistically employed, to give vividness to her story."—Ath., No. 2257.

26. Squire Arden, Lon., 1871, 3 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1875, 1 vol. 27. Ombra, Lon., 1872, 3 vols. cr. 8vo and 12mo; new ed., 1875, 1 vol. 28. Memoir of Count de Montalembert, Peer of France, Deputy for the Department of Doubs: a Chapter of Recent French History, Lon., 1872, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"As we read Mrs. Oliphant's volumes we miss Montalembert as his friends knew him,—astute, impetuous, sarcastic; quick to get into his opinions and very slow to get out of them again; with a Gladstonian power of making the whole world for the time being run upon one consideration, and a power of ready speech Gladstonian in its volume, but not in its epigram, and (as suited the son of a Frenchman and an Englishwoman) equally ready in both languages to prove that this one thing was the whole world; but, behind all these salient manifestations, possessed of a unity of purpose which sooner or later was sure to fix the more volatile attributes of the external man. . . . The reader of Mrs. Oliphant's book would almost as little have imagined that Montalembert was systematically a prime master of sublime banter as that genius and not physical comeliness marked his appearance. . . . We could almost suspect that, as her literary correspondence with him preceded any personal acquaintance, she must have constructed an ideal Montalembert of troubadour aspect, which always maintained a successful rivalry in her mind's eye with the more characteristic reality."—*Sat. "Fresh or weary, she is always original. Her books have a certain stamp of their own, an individuality of character, and an unhackneyed plan of story that go far to redeem some of the faults which time and use and haste only deepen. . . . In this her latest production she has given signs that she would be all the better for a rest, and a spell of play-time void of pen and paper."—Sat. Rev., xxxv. 594.

32. Innocent: a Tale of Modern Life, Lon., 1873, p. 8vo. 33. The Makers of Florence, Dante, Giotto, Savonarola, and their City, Lon., 1874, 8vo; 2d ed., 1877.

"The work before us is a specimen of modern bookmaking; not at all a bad specimen, but still recognizable at once by the usual marks of that particular professional product. . . . The title sounds well, but it is not accurate. The men whom Mrs. Oliphant has written about did not make Florence, but found the city existing already in the most vigorous life. . . . The book is divided into three main parts, one treating of Dante, another of the Cathedral-Builders, and the third of the Monks of San Marco. It concludes with a chapter on Michael Angelo. . . . The literary workmanship in the biographical studies and sketches is that of a practised hand; indeed, we have often felt tempted to regret the degree of literary facility and skill which constantly seduces the author into elegant and appropriate phrase-making."—*Sat. "She has written over-hastily about a writer who requires careful and reverential treatment more than any one else in the roll of modern literature. The dignified learning of Miss Rossetti's 'Shadow of Dante,' and the wide and discriminating criticism of Mr. Symonds in his 'Introduction to the Study of Dante,' make Mrs. Oliphant's book seem doubly slipshod by comparison."—M. A Beleaguered City: being a Narrative of Certain Recent Events in the City of Semur, Department of the Haute-Bourgogne: a Story of the Seen and the Unseen, Lon., 1880, p. 8vo; new ed., 1881.

"She has aimed . . . to make it evident how great is the difficulty of establishing any real intercourse between the seen and the unseen, except that which already exists in the spiritual faith and purified affections of the highest human natures. . . . Of all the books of hers with which the present writer at least is acquainted, he would select this as giving more unquestionable proofs of genius and originality than any other."—Spectator, liii. 177.

50. Cervantes, ("Foreign Classics for English Readers,") Edin., 1880, 12mo.

"That she should have sent out under her name so immature, so ill-considered, and not seldom so inaccurate a book is as surprising as it is deplorable."—Sat. Rev., lvi. 379.

"She has underrated Sheridan's merits as a man of letters, and given far too much prominence to his failings as a man."—Spectator, lvii. 124.

58. Hester: a Story of Contemporary Life, Lon., 1883, 3 vols. cr. 8vo.

"She is at her best in 'Hester.' There, from first to last, she is the Mrs. Oliphant of 'Salem Chapel' and 'Miss Marjoribanks,'—an artist, that is, in portraiture and observation, an excellent humourist, a master of human character, and an adept in certain forms of human experience."—Acad., xxv. 5.

"Mrs. Oliphant, as a practised writer with a strong appreciation of the romantic and an honest deference for the verities of history, has summed up, without novelty and without profound research, what the careless and sentimental readers care most to know about the city of the Lagunes."—Nation, xlvii. 119.

"Certainly this is among the most charming of the many charming books that have been inspired by Venice."—Spectator, lxi. 453.

69. Joyce: a Novel, Lon., 1888, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. 70. The Second Son, Lon., 1888, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. (Published originally in collaboration with T. B. Aldrich, in the Atlantic Monthly.) 71. Memoir of Principal Tulloch, Edin. and Lon., 1888, 8vo.

"Perhaps if human life and energy were equal to such a task, all biographies should be written in duplicate,—one for those who have known the man, and wish to be reminded of all they remember; one for those who have not known him, but who wish to make acquaintance with a new figure and to connect the inward life of the man with his external sphere of action. Mrs. Oliphant has given us the former rather than the latter, but she has given us the latter too, only embedded in much detail which rather detracts from, than adds to, the effect of her study of Principal Tulloch's character and personality for those who have no individual memories to revivify."—Spectator, lxi. 1508.

2. The Jacobite Lairds of Gask, (Grampian Club Pub.,) Lon., 1870, 8vo. 3. The Sources of Standard English, Lon., 1873, 12mo.

"He has thought and studied under the guidance of the best recent writers. . . . The characteristic feature of the book is that it gives the results of their researches and of Mr. Oliphant's own in the form of a narrative, not of a grammar or discussion on grammar."—Sat. Rev., xxxvii. 57.

"Mr. Oliphant has done good service in bringing together and making easily accessible so much of this hitherto rare learning. . . . The early part of the book is disfigured for American and German readers by its use of Rask's classifications of the early inflections, which have been long known to be all wrong."—Nation, xviii. 269.

4. The Duke and the Scholar, and other Essays, Lon., 1875, 8vo. 5. The Old and Middle English, Lon., 1878, 12mo.

"He has embodied in it . . . all that he thought worth preserving in his former volume on the 'Sources of Standard English;' and to this earlier matter he has made large additions, throwing the whole into a form which will make the work, when complete, the best history of our language."—Sat. Rev., xlvii. 625.

6. The New English, Lon., 1886, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The new volumes have very little of the literary attractiveness which characterized their predecessor. Instead of attempting to write a readable book, Mr. Oliphant has been content with producing the most valuable collection of materials for the lexical history of the English language that has hitherto been published. . . . The present work consists essentially of an analysis of the vocabulary, not, indeed, of every important writer or book, but of a continuous series of representative books from the beginning of the fourteenth to the beginning of the nineteenth century."—HENRY BRADLEY: Acad., xxxi. 19.

Life of Thomas Grant, First Bishop of Southwark, Lon., 1874, 8vo; 2d ed., 1886.

"We willingly make the acknowledgment which Miss Ramsay asks of her Protestant readers, that the time spent in reading this biography will not be lost. Bishop Grant was a man of many spiritual graces, whose purity, self-devotion, and humility it will profit every one to contemplate."—Spectator, xlvii. 891.

5. Frederic Ozanam, Professor of the Sorbonne: his Life and Works, Edin., 1876, p. 8vo; new ed., 1879.

"A very pleasant volume. . . . She has depicted both the host and the hostess in graphic, vivid lines, and the numerous extracts from the letters of Mme. Mohl incorporated in the volume will enable the reader to judge as at first hand of the raciness of her diction, for Mme. Mohl wrote as she talked."—Sat. Rev., lxi. 57.

"Generally speaking, the lines of the portrait are drawn too much from her later years; but it is extraordinarily life-like, and a valuable addition to the salon gallery."—Nation, xlii. 112.

"Ample stores of information, either in manuscript or print, have been here digested and sifted with praiseworthy diligence and accuracy. We are distinctly warned by the author that his 'lives' are not complete biographies. He traces the descent and development of the office held, rather than the private history of each successive holder."—Sat. Rev., lvii. 151.

2. (Ed.) The Arniston Memoirs: Three Centuries of a Scottish Home, 1571–1838; from the Family Papers, Edin., 1887, 8vo. (Relates to the family of Dundas.)

"The author . . . is the same whom Mr. Seward accuses of having engaged in a body-snatching voyage to Corea. . . . He . . . coolly and without denial tells us that the main object of his voyage was to steal some buried relics held in great veneration by the regent of this peninsular kingdom, . . . and to make commercial intercourse the sine quâ non of the return of the stolen bones, corpses, ancestral tablets, or heirlooms. . . . Mr. Oppert has recorded his adventures and observations in a style that savors at times of Hans Breitman, of country newspapers, and of the British slang at China ports."—Nation. xxx. 271.

"His knowledge of the people and country is in a measure derived from personal experience gained during his three trips to the country, during which, though not admitted to any large town, he took several long walks in the interior, and visited many villages on the islands, the coast of the mainland, and on the banks of the Kang-Kiang, the large river leading to the capital (Saoul) and discovered by him."—Acad., xvii. 451.
